expect to make a profit over and above that 5 or 6 per cent, I should say that the plan as prepared by the minority would be a perfectly satisfactory plan.

Mr. KNOX and Mr. KITTREDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Is it not true—at least it was the impression I received as a member of the committee, listening pretty carefully to the testimony and reading much more carefully that portion of it which I did not hear—that neither set of engineers said it was not possible to build the canal upon the scheme suggested by the other, but that one side thought, for reasons that appealed to them, that the lock canal was the better canal, while the other side, for reasons which appealed to them, thought that the sea-level canal was the better canal? And is it not true that this dispute about what the majority thought of the minority's plan and what the minority thought of the majority's plan can be fortified either way by an examination of specific portions of the testimony?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly. That is the reason why I objected to the Senator from South Dakota interrupting me and reading certain portions of the testimony, because it does not present the real testimony of any witness or the position of the various engineers who were before us. In order to understand and appreciate that we must read the testimony in connection with what goes before and what follows.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield for a question.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I wanted simply to read further from the testimony of Mr. Parsons upon the subject of the Gatun dam.

Mr. HOPKINS. You had your say on the Gatun dam, if you will permit me that expression. I do not say it in an offensive sense. But the Senator had his day on that dam.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Very well.

Mr. HOPKINS. And he quoted what Mr. Parsons said, and the Senator from Pennsylvania called attention to what I have just read, to show what Mr. Parsons's real position was. Mr. Parsons's position is that the Government can afford to spend money which a private corporation could not, and that, as this is a great international question, the Government should not stand upon the amount of money to be expended or the time it will take. That is the position of Mr. Parsons.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I have not pretended to suggest that the lock plan, which is being advocated now by the Senator from Illinois, has been held to be impracticable by any of the engineers. I am perfectly willing to admit that with the exception of the Gatun dam the lock plan has been held to be feasible, and that it becomes a question merely of choice as between the two types of canal proposed. What I am disappointed about is that the Senator from Illinois appears to be attacking the engineers in his argument here, claiming that it is impossible to construct these dams with safety in connection with the sea-level canal when there are infinitely more important dams to be constructed in the lock plan, which he regards as being capable of being safely constructed.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator from Florida had followed my argument, he would have understood that instead of attacking the type of canal, I was attacking the amount of information that is given to the Senate upon which the Senate must determine between the two types; and I was showing to the Senators that the majority of the committee, while they do condemn the plan of the minority and the construction of the dam at Gatun, had undertaken to commit the Senate to a sea-level canal when they did not have the information to show to Senators whose votes they wanted that those dams could be constructed and maintained at the several places proposed.

Now, the mere fact that the minority of the board of engineers did not specifically attack those four dams and the foundation, etc., is no reason why I should not do it. When I am called upon to vote in the Senate upon a great proposition like this, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of money, which must be taken from the taxpayers of this country, it behooves me to challenge a plan that I do not approve and to show the dearth of evidence that supports the integrity of the canal proposed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I have no objection to the Senator from Illinois taking that position; I have no objection to his attacking this plan as he sees proper to attack it; but I want him to understand that when he is attacking that plan he is attacking the minority of the Board of Engineers who gave him the plan that he is advocating here.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have said that the minority of the Board in presenting their plan did not deem it necessary to go into details in attacking the plan of the majority.

The more the conditions on the Isthmus have been studied by eminent engineers the greater appear the obstacles to the successful construction and operation of a sea-level canal and the more desirable and practicable seems to be a lock-level canal. Chief Engineer Stevens, who is now in charge of the Government work on the Isthmus, is clearly of the opinion that a lock-level canal, as proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, is the only feasible and rational method to be adopted by the Government in the construction of a canal across the Isthmus. This opinion is shared by General Ernst, of the Regular Army, a man eminent as a civil engineer, and by General Hains, whom many regard as one of the most eminent civil engineers of his day. These engineers are emphatic in their condemnation of the sea-level canal proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers and in their indorsement of the views of Chief Engineer Stevens in support of the plan proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

In the construction of any canal across the Isthmus the item of cost is a matter of great, if not paramount, importance. I know that many think that the Government's resources are without limit and that the amount of money that is expended in the construction of this proposed canal across the Isthmus is a matter of secondary, if not of little, importance. We must remember, however, that every dollar of money which is used in the construction of this great engineering project is taken from the taxpayers of this country. We should therefore as carefully consider the estimated cost of the two types of canal that are now under consideration as we would any other question that involves the taxation of the people of the country. If a canal for all practical purposes can be constructed on a lock level that will meet the requirements of trade and commerce for about one-half that a sea-level canal will cost, it is wasteful extravagance to vote for a sea-level canal simply because a sea-level canal meets with our ideals of what a canal should be that unites the waters of the Atlantic with the Pacific.

The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers state that the sea-level canal, as proposed by them, will cost $247,000,000. That amount is adopted in the report of the majority of the Interoceanic Canal Committee, who favor the sea-level canal. The same board estimate that the lock-level canal proposed by the minority will cost $139,750,200. In other words, they admit that the sea-level canal that they propose, with all its shortcomings and imperfections, which I but faintly and imperfectly expressed here to-day, will cost, in round numbers, $107,000,000 more than the lock-level canal proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and which, as I have said, has met the approval of the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Secretary of War—who has direct charge of the construction of the canal, under the President—and the President himself. This item of itself, as it seems to me, is sufficient to cause Senators to pause before they take action that will incur this extra amount of expense and force that amount of taxation upon the people of this country. One hundred and seven millions of dollars is a very large sum of money. At 2 per cent interest it aggregates an annual tax upon the people of $2,140,000, and this, Senators will remember, is in perpetuity.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask a question for information. The Senator states the difference in cost to the country of the construction of the two types of canals. I should like to know what about the maintenance. I have heard it said that there is a very great difference, and that a sea-level canal could be maintained at an enormously less cost than a lock canal.

Mr. HOPKINS. When you take into consideration the cost of the two canals, the maintenance of a sea-level canal will be $2,000,000 per annum more than a lock canal.

Mr. KEAN. The sea level?

Mr. HOPKINS. When you consider the amount of money invested and the expense for maintaining it and add them together, the sea level will cost, in round numbers, $2,000,000 per annum more than the lock canal.

Mr. KEAN. That is practically the interest on the money.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; it is practically the interest on the money.

Mr. PERKINS. How much is saved in operating it?

Mr. HOPKINS. How much is saved in operating it in what way?

Mr. PERKINS. How much less will it cost to operate a sea-level canal than a lock canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. The witnesses differ upon that subject. You can go into the book of evidence here and you can get witnesses who vary as widely upon these propositions as the Senator from South Dakota and I have differed on the questions that I have already discussed. But when you take the sum of all the witnesses and put them together and analyze them there is not very much difference in the actual cost of maintaining the one over the other. It is more expensive to maintain the locks at Gatun than the locks at sea level on the Pacific side. But all along the line of the sea-level canal where the vessels meet each other and where they tie up you must have people employed. So, as I have said, the witnesses differ upon that subject.

It is claimed by the Isthmian Canal Commission, who have made a careful study of the figures presented in the majority and the minority reports of the Consulting Board of Engineers, as to the cost of the construction of the two types of canal proposed, that the estimate made by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers is incorrect, and that instead of the sea-level canal costing $247,000,000 its cost will be found to be not less than $272,000,000, an increase of $25,000,000 over the estimate of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Is it not a fact that all the engineers upon the Consulting Board agreed in their unit prices for all the work?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, while that is true, I have said that this was not attacked by the Board of Engineers, but it is the Commission, upon which we find such eminent engineers as General Ernst and General Hains, and I said specifically to Senators that this extra expense is the amount that was figured by the Commission, upon which Commission, in my judgment, are two of the ablest engineers of this age, two brave and patriotic Americans, who do not wish to mislead the Senate or the House or the country upon the expense of this work. These are the men who have said that for the excavation in Culebra cut the same price should be granted to the contractor or in the estimate of expense that we have at other portions there.

An examination of the figures as to the cost of the sea-level canal, found on page 51 of the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, explains fully this shortage of $25,000,000 in their report. In the majority report of the Board of Consulting Engineers the estimated cost for excavation in Culebra cut below elevation plus 10 aggregates $20,242,877.50. This item covers the excavation of 16,194,302 cubic yards in the Culebra cut, of which 11,439,612 cubic yards are below the level of the sea. The Board in arriving at their estimate as to the cost of the sea-level canal have taken a uniform price of $1.25 per yard for the 16,194,302 cubic yards. In other words, while in their detailed statement they only allow $0.80 per cubic yard for excavation in Culebra cut above the sea level and $1.25 below in making up their total of $20,242,877.50, they take the uniform price of $1.25 per cubic yard. For the excavation of rock below sea level between Mindi and Bohio, a distance of about 12 miles, they allow $2.50 per cubic yard, and for the excavation of rock between Bohio and Obispo they allow in their estimates for rock excavated below sea level $2.50 per cubic yard.

No reason is given in their estimates and no reason is given in their report why the rock in Culebra cut below sea level should not cost as much as the excavation of rock between Mindi and Bohio below sea level and the excavation of rock below sea level between Bohio and Obispo. In fact, if any change in the estimate should be made for the excavation of rock below sea level, it would seem to a layman that it would cost more to excavate the rock in Culebra cut below sea level than at any other point in the sea-level canal. Such eminent engineers as General Ernst, General Hains, and Mr. Harrod agree that it will cost at least as much to excavate the rock below sea level at Culebra cut as it will at any other point in the canal. If this is allowed, it increases the cost of the sea-level canal for excavation in Culebra cut $14,299,515, and adding the usual 20 per cent for contingencies, the estimate will be increased to $17,159,418. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, who report on the cost of constructing the sea-level canal, estimate only $3,500,000 as the cost of completing the river diversions and the constructing of these four dams that I have spoken of somewhat at length. The Commission has shown that this expenditure will aggregate $7,800,000 more than the estimate made by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. According to these estimates, then, the sea-level canal will cost $132,000,000 more than the lock-level canal proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. Here is a saving in interest on the investment made in the construction of the two canals of $2,640,000 per annum. It is shown from the above figures that the sea-level canal, proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, will cost nearly double what the lock-level canal will cost, that is proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. These figures do not give an adequate expression to what either type of canal before it is constructed and ready for use will cost the Government.

Mr. Stearns, one of the very ablest engineers of this or any other country, who has given this subject very careful study, has made an estimate of the cost of the two types of canal on the estimate offered by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KITTREDGE. In that connection, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to read from the testimony before the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. I can not yield for that. I will yield to the Senator for a question, but I can not stop for an argument.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Then I will ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not now stop for that. The Senator will have plenty of time to controvert any statement which I may make, and my time is passing too rapidly for me to be interrupted by the reading of testimony.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. He has assumed as correct the statement that the lock canal would cost $140,000,000 and would take nine years for its construction from 1906, and has given an estimate of what that would cost the Government at the time that the canal is completed and ready for use. He has also taken the estimate of the cost of the sea-level canal at $247,000,000, as proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and has shown what that would cost at the expiration of its completion at the end of fifteen years and of eighteen years, respectively. He has shown that when the Government has completed the lock level and has it ready for use it will have cost the Government $219,000,000, and that the sea-level canal, when it is completed at the expiration of fifteen years, will be a cost to the Government of $363,000,000, and if it takes eighteen years to complete it, as many eminent engineers say it will, the cost to the Government will be $413,000,000. By the permission of the Senate, I will insert at this point the statement of Mr. Stearns and his estimate:

RELATIVE AMOUNT OF INTEREST DURING CONSTRUCTION ON LOCK AND SEA-LEVEL CANALS.

In both cases assume that the interest is at 2 per cent, compounded annually.

Assume in both cases an expenditure of $50,000,000 in 1904.

In the case of the lock canal assume a total expenditure for the ten years from 1905 to 1915, inclusive, of $14,000,000 per year, making a total of $140,000,000 for construction.

For the sea-level canal assume the expenditure of $14,500,000 in 1904, and of $15,500,000 in each of the next fifteen years, making a total of $247,000,000 for construction.

Interest on sea-level canal if completed in fifteen years	$66,297,000
Interest on lock canal if completed in nine years	28,502,000
Difference in favor of lock canal	37,795,000
If the time for constructing the sea-level canal should extend to eighteen years, the interest account would amount to	88,532,000
Deduct, as before, interest on lock canal	28,502,000
Difference in favor of lock canal	60,030,000
The cost of the lock canal, including interest and payments to the Panama Canal Company and the Republic of Panama, would be	219,000,000
The cost of the sea-level canal, including interest and the above payments, based upon the cost as estimated by the Board of Consulting Engineers, and fifteen years for completion, would be	363,000,000
The cost of the sea-level canal, including interest and the above payments, based upon the cost as estimated by the Isthmian Canal Commission, and eighteen years for completion, would be	410,000,000

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if it is not true that several of the engineers who testified before the committee—I recall now, I think, Mr. Stearns, of Boston, and Mr. Noble—did not they testify that in view of the fact that the dam at Gatun made a lake all the way up to Culebra, and in view of the fact that there was only a 200-foot canal the short distance through the Culebra cut, they would rather have this plan of a lock canal at the same cost and in the same time than a sea-level canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Pennsylvania is correct on that proposition.

Mr. President, from these figures it is apparent that the Government has undertaken a gigantic enterprise and one that will tax its resources before it is completed. It seems to me, therefore, that the cost of the canal should have some consideration with Senators in determining which type will be accepted. It is apparent that the cost of the canal and the time that will be required in its construction had no weight whatever with the foreign engineers who signed the majority report of the Board of Consulting Engineers. These foreigners were looking to the ideal type of canal that should be constructed across this Isthmus. Their people were not to be taxed for its construction and the commerce of their several countries was not to be interfered with during the period that would be taken in the construction, and hence they had every inducement to favor a sea-level canal, and it is not surprising that from their several foreign standpoints they should recommend to this Government the construction of a sea-level canal. It mattered but little to them whether it took $247,000,000 or $410,000,000 or even $600,000,000 to construct the canal. The American engineers, however, who made the minority report, made their report from the American standpoint, and, as they expressly state in their report, time and cost were two elements that had great consideration with them in determining the type of canal that should be recommended.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire some information from the Senator. I have not had time to give this matter a great deal of consideration heretofore. The Senator was stating the difference between the cost of a sea-level canal and the cost of a lock canal, and he stated that the Administration was proceeding to construct a lock canal. What I desire to ask the Senator is whether it is not true that the Administration is proceeding to construct a lock canal, but with the ultimate purpose of converting it into a sea-level canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. Not unless Congress so authorizes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it the policy of the Administration in time to submit that question to Congress, with a view of converting the lock canal into a sea-level canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator means at some future time?

Mr. CULBERSON. At some future time.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is not my understanding. The President's position, as expressed in his message to Congress, is that he will proceed with his forces to construct a lock canal unless Congress authorizes a sea-level canal. Now there is no definite plan.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood that one of the reports of the consulting engineers went to that question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, well, every kind of a proposition has been argued; but if you are speaking of what the Administration proposes, now, of course, the Senator from Texas is as good authority upon that as I am. My understanding is that the proposition is, unless Congress authorizes differently, to construct a lock canal and stand on that.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Senator from Illinois to state that the Administration is now proceeding to construct a lock canal, and I wanted to know if it was not the ultimate purpose to convert it into a sea-level canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that is not my understanding.

General Hains, a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, in his testimony before the Interoceanic Canal Committee of the Senate, stated that in his opinion the sea-level canal proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers would cost from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000 more than the lock-level canal proposed by the minority of that board and indorsed by the Commission. He also took direct issue with the position of the foreign engineers and with Mr. Parsons on the question of time, and stated that in his opinion the time involved in the construction of the canal could not be ignored. That the people expected and would demand that a canal should be constructed in the shortest time possible consistent with a canal that would meet the commercial requirements of the age. He also took occasion to make a statement respecting the sea-level canal which I, with the permission of the Senate, will incorporate in my remarks:

As another reason, I think that the lock canal is really a shorter canal than the sea-level canal. By cutting off through here [indicating] you can reduce the length of that canal 1 mile. That does not amount to much, but still it is something.

I think there is another objection. I think that in a great project like this, involving a large expenditure of money, extended over a prolonged period, the people may become tired of appropriating money and refuse to complete it. I do not think that is an imaginary proposition.

Senator MORGAN. That is where the whole work is going to break down unless we succeed in getting something that they can understand, and that they feel that they can face. It will all "go to pot" unless we do it.

General HAINS. I have a note here on the subject of the opinions of different engineers on this subject.

The first canal that was attempted to be built on the Isthmus was a sea-level canal, substantially the same sea-level canal that is now proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. It occupies the same location in the territory. It provides for a high dam at Gamboa and the holding back of the waters of the Chagres River above that dam, and differs from that of the Consulting Board only in some of its details. The plan of the Consulting Board, of course, enlarges that of the first French company, and extensive changes are made at the two harbors, but essentially it is the old, discredited De Lesseps project of the sea-level canal revived with enlargements and modifications.

After the failure of the first company, a body of engineers known as the "Commission d'Etudes," composed of eleven engineers eminent in their profession in Europe, was organized by the Liquidator in 1889. After a careful study of the technical questions involved in the problem of the canal it rendered this report in 1889. This commission reported in favor of the abandonment of the sea-level canal and the adoption of a project for the completion of a canal with locks. Subsequently another commission known as the "Comite Technique" was organized, composed of fourteen engineers, many of them engineers of the highest standing in the civilized world. They made a report in 1898, recommending a lock canal.

Another commission, known as the "Comite Statutaire," composed of five members, and all except one of them being new men, reported in favor of a lock canal. Later the Isthmian Canal Commission rejected the sea-level plan and adopted the lock plan. There were six engineers in that commission, so that there were no less than thirty-four engineers opposed to the sea-level plan. It is believed that the weight of evidence against the sea-level project and in favor of the lock project can not be ignored in making a decision.

Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of Senators the statement of General Hains that thirty-four engineers, the most eminent in their profession, after careful study have condemned the sea-level canal that is proposed to be adopted by the majority of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and I say with him that the judgment of these engineers can not be ignored in making our decision as to the type of canal that shall be approved of by the Senate. I wish also to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the plan proposed by the majority of the board of consulting engineers and which has been adopted by the majority of the Interoceanic Canal Committee of the Senate is the old, discarded plan that was found impracticable under De Lesseps after an expenditure of $260,000,000.

Mr. KITTREDGE. He squandered it.

Mr. HOPKINS. He squandered it, as the Senator from South Dakota says. I care not whether it was squandered, it is enough for us to know that under the leadership of one of the greatest engineers of the age $260,000,000 was expended, and then he and his company were compelled to confess that a sea-level canal to be constructed by a private company was an impossibility, and that company went into bankruptcy and that great engineer went to his grave.

This plan that is outlined by the majority of the engineers, as the testimony shows, is a reproduction in part of this discarded plan of De Lesseps that proved such a monumental failure. I want to know if Senators are prepared to take up this old project that the French Government, through De Lesseps and his company, found to be a failure, and commit the Government of the United States to it regardless of the question of the expense that will be entailed upon the people of this country.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that the French Government was interested in that canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; through its company. The French Government as a government was not interested. It was a French company. The French Government, as I understand it, authorized the creation of the corporation that was known as "The Panama Canal Company."

Mr. TELLER. The Government never put any money in it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; of course not.

Mr. TELLER. They were notified diplomatically by this Government that they would not be allowed to put any money in it.

Mr. HOPKINS. And if it had been allowed it was governed by too wise a financier ever to embark in a project that would take the amount of money that will be required to be expended in the construction of a sea-level canal which will meet the commercial requirements of the age.

If there ever was a question in which the Government was interested where time is the essence of the contract, the problem now before us is certainly that question. If this canal is to be constructed, as the people have demanded and as Congress has once legislated, every facility should be furnished for constructing it in the shortest possible time. The type of canal, therefore, that meets the commercial and navigating requirements of the age that can be built in the shortest possible time should receive the serious consideration of the Senate.

The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers in their report say:

> It is, therefore, the judgment of the Board that a ship canal on the sea-level plan outlined in this report can be completed within a period of time not exceeding twelve or thirteen years.

They make no estimate as to the length of time that it will take to construct the lock-level canal proposed by the minority of the Board. The minority of the Board, however, in their report not only give an estimate of the time that it will take to construct the canal proposed in their report, but also the length of time that it will take to construct the canal proposed by the majority. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers base their estimates as to the length of time that it will take to construct the sea-level canal on the time that it will take to excavate the Culebra cut to a depth of +40 feet below the sea level. The minority of the Board, on the same basis, say that the sea-level canal can not be constructed in less than fifteen years. The Culebra cut is 8.08 miles long and for a sea-level canal requires 110,000,000 cubic pards of excavation, the heaviest mile requiring 22,000,000 cubic yards, and the heaviest 3,136 feet 14,000,000 cubic yards. To construct a lock canal, as proposed in the minority report of the Board of Consulting Engineers, would require the excavation of 53,800,000 cubic yards from the central mass of Culebra cut and would take seven and one-half years. It is therefore easily demonstrated that if it takes seven and one-half years to excavate 53,800,000 cubic yards from the central mass of Culebra cut in the construction of the lock-level canal, that it will take more than fifteen years to excavate the 110,000,000 cubic yards that will be required to be excavated in the Culebra cut in the construction of the sea level proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. The Isthmian Canal Commission have made a careful estimate as to the time required in the construction of the two types of canal, and their estimate is that it will take nine years to construct the lock-level canal proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and not less than twenty years to construct the sea level proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

The chief engineer, Mr. Stevens, who since these reports were made has not only made a careful study of the estimates made in the respective reports, but has been upon the ground and carefully studied conditions upon the Isthmus, concurs fully in the statement that the sea-level canal proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers can not be constructed in less than twenty years.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator permit a question upon the point of time?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will submit to a question.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will ask the Senator from Illinois, Do we agree that the time for the construction of the sea-level canal will be measured by the time that will be required for the excavation of what is called the "Culebra cut?"

Mr. HOPKINS. I am not in agreement with the Senator from South Dakota upon any proposition connected with the type of canal; I will state this, however, Mr. President—and I refer to the reports, and I challenge the Senator's contradiction if I am wrong—that the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers say in their report that a sea-level canal can be constructed in twelve or thirteen years. Am I correct in that?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I should like, Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator need not answer the question now. That, however, is what the report shows.

The commission that examined the cost and took exception to the estimate made, as I have shown, added twenty-five millions to the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, also took exception to the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers as to the time, and that commission say it will require twenty years within which to build it. That is the record.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will for a question.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I submit, Mr. President, that the Senator has not answered the question that I put to him. It is a very simple one, it seems to me, and that is, Do we agree upon the question of the time which will be required for the construction of a sea-level canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have said to the Senator that I do not agree that the Culebra cut necessarily determines the time. I will, however, take that up and discuss it later.

There are many other propositions that are involved in the construction of a sea-level canal that will, in my judgment, extend the time.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that, with the admitted facts before us, it can be easily demonstrated that this estimate of Chief Engineer Stevens, that the sea-level canal can not be constructed in less than twenty years, is within the limits of reason. All agree that to construct the sea-level canal within the limited space or distance known as the "Culebra cut" 110,000,000 cubic yards of rock must be excavated. Allowing 15 cubic yards for a carload, which is an over rather than an under estimate for a carload, there will be 7,333,333 carloads of rock to be carried away from this cut. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, in making their estimate both as to the cost and time, figured on two hundred and forty working days in the year for that purpose. For the calculation which I here submit I have estimated two hundred and fifty days per working year. To complete the canal within the period of twenty years would require the removal of 366,666 carloads of rock from this cut per year of two hundred and fifty days, or would require the removal of 1,466 carloads per day for every year for a period of twenty years.

Working ten hours a day would require the removal of 146⅔ carloads per hour. Senators can see that within a space of a few miles 146⅔ cars must be handled every hour of every day of ten hours for a period of twenty years in order to excavate the number of cubic yards all admit is necessary to construct the sea-level canal. It seems to me that it will be found to be a physical impossibility to make any arrangement by which 1,466 cars can be handled in this short space within a period of ten hours. This, you will remember, is not an exceptional ten hours, but is for every day in the year, and is to be continued for a period of twenty years. It requires the handling of about 2½ cars per minute for the period of twenty years.

In my judgment, Mr. President, it will be impossible to meet the requirements that I have here shown to be necessary in order to complete the canal within a period of twenty years. Senators must remember that that cut for long distances, when it reaches the bed of the proposed sea-level canal, will have a height on either side of the canal prism of 206 feet. This rock, as it reaches sea level, must be lifted, therefore, over this wall on either side, 160 feet, to be loaded into the cars, or it must be transported to one end or the other of the cut and at those points loaded onto the cars. I can not see how it will be possible to handle that number of cars at this point per day for every day during the two hundred and fifty working days, and for a period of twenty years. They must go on without interruption, without accident, without delay of any kind. It requires more credulity, Mr. President, than the average citizen possesses to believe that this sea-level canal, under the conditions admitted by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers to exist, can be constructed in a period of less than twenty years, as estimated by the Isthmian Canal Commission and by the chief engineer in charge of the work. Is there any Senator on this floor who believes that the country would have consented to have embarked upon this great enterprise if the people had understood that it would take twenty years from the time that construction upon the canal was actually commenced before it was completed and ready for use? When we remember, Mr. President, that many of these engineers who have carefully studied the two types of canal, claim that the lock-level canal, proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, as a commercial and maritime proposition, will be superior to the sea-level canal, how can any Senator justify the adoption of a plan of a sea-level canal that will delay the people of this country for a period of twenty years before they can realize the accomplishment of their wishes, and see a canal across the Isthmus of Panama that will unite the waters of the two great oceans?

No authority has estimated the time necessary to construct the lock-level canal at greater than nine years, suggested first by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and after a full investigation, adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission as the maximum time required in constructing and completing the lock-level canal. This seems like a long time. It covers a period that will extend over two Federal Administrations. It is one and one-half times greater than a Senatorial term and four and one-half times longer than a term of a Member of the House of Representatives. To extend this period to fifteen or twenty years in order to construct the sea-level canal, proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, means that this generation will not see the completion of the canal. The people of this country, in my judgment, will demand that a type of canal shall be adopted by Congress than can be completed in their day and generation. They are willing to be taxed for the construction of this marvelous enterprise and will pay their respective amounts that they will be required to contribute through the taxation laws of the country to its completion, provided they can see it completed and ready for use. They will, however, in my judgment, protest against an enterprise that is to tax them without any benefits to be derived in their generation. I am well aware that some of the witnesses who have appeared before the Interoceanic Canal Committee of the Senate have placed the time for the completion of the lock-level canal at a period less than that given by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers and by the Isthmian Canal Commission. Their estimates, however, in my judgment, are based upon data that are not reasonable and that can not be relied upon. If I were to give the guess of a layman upon this subject, I would say that both types of a canal will take longer time to complete them than any estimates from any of these boards from which I have drawn the figures which I have here given. I think, therefore, that the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, in coming to the conclusion as to the type of a canal to be adopted, acted wisely and well when they considered the time and cost of the canal as proper elements to determine their judgment in the premises.

General Ernst, in his testimony before our committee, said:

> I have made a very careful review of all the arguments presented on both sides as exhibited in these two reports which you have before you—the majority and the minority reports—and I am satisfied that the United States will get a perfectly satisfactory canal in very much less time and for very much less money under the plan proposed by the minority. I believe that the canal under that plan will cost little more than half what the canal of the majority will cost, and the time will be a little more than half, and when done it will be a better canal, because it will be three times as big a canal.

General Hains, in his testimony on the subject, in speaking of the project as to the construction of the canal that was submitted by the Commission of 1901, said:

> Yes, sir; what you call "the commission of exploration;" and we state in our report the reason why we rejected the sea-level canal, and we stated it in this way, on page 88 of that report: "That this Commission concurs with the various French commissions which have preceded it since the failure of the old company in rejecting the sea-level plan, and while such a plan would be physically practicable, and might be adopted if no other solution were available, the difficulties of all kinds, and especially those of time and cost, would be so great that a canal with a summit level reached by locks is to be preferred."

It is apparent from what General Hains says that the Commission of 1901 not only gave very close attention to the conditions on the Isthmus with a view of determining which type of canal to recommend, but they went into the action of previous commissions and concurred fully with those commissions which had been appointed to determine on the type of canal after the failure of De Lesseps in the proposition that the difficulties in the way of a sea-level canal, considering time and expense as elements, were too great to ever think of the construction of a canal of that type across the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. President, the conditions facing us on this subject are such that, in my opinion, if the Senate declares for a sea-level canal by its vote upon the bill that is now pending it will mean that the Senate is putting itself in antagonism with the House of Representatives and with the Administration, and I feel for one with the facts before us respecting the two types of canal, that we should not hesitate to indorse the recommendations of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers and put the Administration in a position where it will not be paralyzed in hastening the completion of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

In what I have said thus far, Mr. President, I have limited my remarks to a criticism of the type of canal proposed to be adopted in the bill which has been sent to the Senate by the majority of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and I have endeavored to show the impracticable nature of the canal and the unwisdom of the Senate declaring for the sea-level canal recommended by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOPKINS. For a question.

Mr. PERKINS. If it does not interrupt the Senator, I ask a question for information. He used the expression in his very interesting and instructive discussion several times of the "imperfect sea-level canal," as contrasted with the "perfect lock canal." Is it on account of a difference in the curvature—the angles? Is there not the same depth of water in the sea-level canal that there is in the lock canal, and also the same width?

Mr. HOPKINS. I thank the Senator from California for challenging my attention to that. I will speak of it more at length later; but I will say to the Senator that under the plan of the lock canal the depth of water at Gatun, instead of being 40 feet, which is the uniform depth of the sea level, is 75 feet, and from that point to Obispo it is more than 45 feet. So for a distance of 30 miles the depth of the lock canal is 5 feet more at every point than the sea-level canal.

Mr. KNOX. For its entire length.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; as the Senator from Pennsylvania suggests, for its entire length it is 5 feet more in depth than the sea-level canal.

Now, instead of being only 150 feet wide from Gatun to Bohio, the lock canal is 1,000 feet wide. I will give to the Senator those figures.

Mr. PERKINS. From a nautical standpoint those are very important factors.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator has anticipated my remarks a little, and perhaps it will be better for me now to take up that proposition and show to Senators what is proposed in the lock canal.

The plan is a modification of the one adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1901. The Spooner Act of June 28, 1902, required greater dimensions and a canal that would accommodate larger vessels than the project suggested by the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1901. The elevation of the summit level is nearly the same as in the project suggested by the Commission of 1901. Since the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1901 the information that has been developed regarding the site at Bohio for a dam, and at Gatun, has been such as to lead engineers to recommend the site for the dam to control the waters of the Chagres to be constructed at Gatun instead of Bohio. And on the Pacific side the lock canal is placed at Sosa instead of at Miraflores, as was suggested in the plan of the Commission of 1901.

As Senators can see from an examination of the map showing the line of the proposed lock canal with the summit level at 85 feet, the canal begins in the Bay of Limon, a mile northwest of the town of Colon, with a channel 500 feet in width and 41 feet in depth at mean tide, running, as you will see from this map, due south to the shore line of Limon Bay, at the mouth of the Mindi River. This distance is 4½ miles. The plan of the canal passes through the low and swampy ground near the mouth of the Mindi River and extends in a southerly direction 3 miles to the town of Gatun. The width of the canal is 500 feet, with a depth of 45 feet.

At Gatun there is a space between the hills of over 7,000 feet, through which the waters of the Chagres and its tributaries flow to the sea. This space is buttressed on either side with rocks and hills, and about midway in this space there is a mountain of rock and earth, in which it is proposed to excavate a diversion channel through which the Chagres River will flow during the construction of the earth dam. The plan is to construct this dam across the entire space of 7,700 feet at a height of 135 feet above sea level. The proposition of this plan is to inclose the waters of the Chagres and its tributaries and create a lake, which will be something over 30 miles long and several miles wide. From this channel, 500 feet wide at the shore of Limon Bay, at the mouth of the Mindi River, extending to the town of Gatun, vessels are to be raised to the level of the lake, to be known as "Lake Gatun," by three duplicate locks ranging in a flight of steps, each lock being 900 feet interior length, 95 feet wide, 40 feet deep over the miter sills, with a lift in each lock of 28⅔ feet. As I have said, these locks are in duplicate, and these six locks, constructed of a mass of masonry and concrete, will be buried in Gatun Hill and founded on rock throughout. Lake Gatun, when created by the construction of this dam, will be about 110 square miles in area, and will form the summit level of the canal. The lake will also serve to impound water for lockage and other purposes during the dry season and to give open navigation from Gatun to Obispo.

I can best give a description in the words of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers:

> The total length of the lake will be 30 miles, of which 23 miles will be navigated by ships crossing the Isthmus. Its depth will be about 75 feet in the immediate vicinity of the dam, this being maintained with little reduction to Bohio (a distance of about 10 miles), and thence reducing gradually toward Obispo, where the depth of 45 feet will be obtained with but little excavation, the bed of the river being about 45 feet below the surface of the future lake.

For 15.69 miles above the Gatun locks the deep portion of the lake will have generally a width exceeding half a mile, and only a small amount of excavation will be required to provide a navigable channel nowhere less than 1,000 feet wide at the bottom and 45 feet deep. Father up the lake, as the amount of excavation required to obtain a depth of 45 feet increases, the minimum width of the channel will be decreased, first to 800 feet for a distance of 3.86 miles from San Pablo to Juan Grande, then to 500 feet for 3.73 miles to Obispo, and to 300 feet for 1.55 miles from Obispo to Las Cascades, where the channel will be further narrowed to 200 feet through the heaviest portion of the great central mass known as Culebra. * * *

For a distance of 4.7 miles through the deep portion of the Culebra cut the channel is to have a bottom width of 200 feet and to have nearly vertical sides below the water line, and then will become 300 feet wide for 1.88 miles to the Pedro Miguel locks, where the summit level will end. The duplicate locks at Pedro Miguel will have one lift of 31 feet. Passing the locks the channel will be 500 feet wide for 1.64 miles, then increasing to 1,000 feet or more for the further distance of 3.38 miles to the Sosa locks on the shore of Panama Bay. This broad navigation will be in an artificial lake created by three dams, to be subsequently described. There are to be duplicate flights of locks on the west side of Sosa Hill near La Boca with tow lifts of about 31 feet each from ordinary low tide to the level of Lake Sosa. * * *

From the Sosa lock to the 7-fathom curve in Panama Bay, a distance of 4 miles, the channel is to be 300 feet wide at the bottom and 45 feet deep below mean tide. * * *

The waterway may be summarized with reference to channel widths as follows:

Width.	Length.	Per cent of route.
	Miles.
1000 feet	19.08	38.4
Locks and approaches	2.58	5.2
Total	49.72	100.0

It thus appears that only about one-seventh of the distance is in channels less than 300 feet wide, while for more than two-thirds of the distance the channels are 500 feet or more wide.

This route passes over the continental divide at Culebra at about the same point that it is proposed to construct the sea-level canal, and, as I have already said, to construct this canal across this cut it would be necessary to excavate 53,800,000 cubic yards of rock. This carries the cut down to sea level, and for a distance of 4.70 miles makes the width of the canal only 200 feet. At all other points the narrowest place is 300 feet.

Senators can see from this statement that the dam at Gatun is the key to the construction and the successful operation of the lock canal. If a dam can be maintained at that point of the dimensions proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers in the manner suggested in their plan, the solution of the great problem of a lock-level canal has been reached. Doubts have, however, been suggested by the majority of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in their report and by Senator KITTREDGE, who spoke in favor of the sea-level canal the other day, as to the stability of an earth dam at Gatun. The problem of constructing the dam of earth instead of concrete is one that has long since been solved by engineers. If the foundation is such that a dam can be constructed at Gatun, I think there is no engineer in this or any other country who would hazard his reputation by denying that an earth dam of the proportions suggested in the report of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers can not be safely constructed and maintained at this point. The doubt that is attempted to be raised is as to the foundations upon which the dam is proposed to be constructed. This subject has been very elaborately considered, not only by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, but by the Isthmian Canal Commission, which contains four of the great engineers of the country among its members, and by Chief Engineer Stevens, who justly stands in the first rank of great engineers in this country. A more elaborate examination of the condition of the soil and earth in and about Gatun and across this space where the dam is proposed to be constructed has been made for the purpose of determining whether this dam can be built than has ever been made at any point across the Isthmus in all of the investigations that have been had prior to the present time. This map, to which I call the attention of Senators, indicates by this long and uneven line what is known as "indurated clay," a species of rock which engineers say is as safe for the foundation for the construction of a dam upon it as any other rock can well be. A part of the distance in and about Gatun, and on either side of the space where the dam is to be located, this indurated clay comes to the sea level, and in all of the points excepting two it is found from 20 to 40-odd feet below the surface of the soil. At two places there are depressions, as is seen upon this map, one where the depression is something like 205 feet in depth, and the other where the depression is something like 258 feet. In the depression of 258 feet for 200 feet the soil is impervious, according to the testimony of the engineers who favor a lock-level canal.

The dimensions of the dam at this point are 7,700 feet in length, 2,625 feet in width at sea level, of a height of 135 feet, and a width at the height of 85 feet of 374 feet, and a width of 100 feet at the top. The dam will contain, when completed, 21,000,000 cubic yards of material. At either end of this 7,700 feet in length the dam is buttressed by rocks in the mountains on either side of this depression. About midway in this dam of 7,700 feet there is a high ground or mountain that runs up nearly to the top of the dam and becomes a part of it. It is at this point, as I have already shown, it is proposed to build the spillway for the discharge of the surplus water of Lake Gatun.

In the borings that were had at this point the deepest one showed that the borings struck rock 258 feet below sea level. The lower 58 feet is of a more porous character, and some of the borings show water below that [indicating]; and that is the point upon which the Senator from South Dakota laid such stress in his statement the other day.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. For a question.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Does the Senator claim that the borings above the last 58 feet which he has mentioned exhibit no indications of water?

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator had held his soul in patience, I would have come to that. It is my purpose to put the Senate, if I am able to do it, in possession of all the facts relating to this great dam that is proposed to be constructed here. I propose to do it without color, and I propose to do it in a way that will show the Senators that the apprehensions of the Senator from South Dakota are not well founded.

The engineers who formed the minority of the Consulting Board stated in their report that this was undoubtedly deposited at a time when the currents through the gorge were swifter than existed when the upper 200 feet of the alluvial material was deposited. In the upper 200 feet some of the late borings show fine sand, while other borings near by show clay at the same depths, indicating, as do previous borings, that the upper 200 feet is practically impervious material. There was an overflow, the engineers report, from several of the borings which penetrated the gravelly material in the bottom of the deep gorge, although the tops of the casings were above the surface of the river. This showed, they claim, conclusively that there was no near connection with the bed of the river; in other words, that the material covering the sand and the gravel was impervious for a long distance. The engineers show that if the dam is built at Gatun, from the information they have there will be no appreciable seepage under the dam owing to the practically impervious nature of the material on which it will rest, and that the pervious material at the bottom of this gorge was covered by a blanket of impervious material 200 feet thick.

This dam has a weight of about 1 ton per square foot for each 20 feet in height of embankment, and engineers who favor the minority plan say that under the highest point in the embankment the pressure would be 6½ tons per square foot. They say that a dam constructed as is proposed in their plans and specifications of the dimensions I have here indicated would be not only impervious to any seepage of water, but that it will withstand for all time the head of water that is proposed to be maintained in Lake Gatun.

Much testimony was taken by the committee as respects the foundation of the dam and its stability to maintain for all time a resistance of the elements and of the head of water that is to be maintained at all seasons of the year in Lake Gatun. Chief Engineer Stevens, before the committee and on many other occasions, has stated unequivocally that the dam constructed as I have here briefly outlined is upon a firm and durable foundation and that it will remain there as long as any of the hills and mountains that form a part of this country remain in their several locations.

Mr. Stearns, in speaking of this dam before our committee, stated:

I wish to say very distinctly that this is not, in my opinion, an engineering guess. It is as capable of demonstration as any problem that comes up in engineering; and further than that, that there has been allowed a factor of safety that is beyond all factors that have been allowed in the past.

In further testifying in regard to this matter, in answer to the following question which I put to Mr. Stearns:

Your claim is that there is no guess about it, but that it is demonstrated to a certainty that the dam will stand as put there?

He said:

Absolutely; and it is the ignoring of the information obtained in the last fourteen years in regard to the movement of the water through sands and other earths that makes any such statement as is made here by a member of the majority an engineering guess which is a very bad one.

General Hains, who appeared before the committee, was asked by Senator MORGAN:

I suppose, of course, you have examined carefully and exhaustively the proposed site for a dam at Gatun and the site for a spillway cut through the hill there?

General HAINS. Yes, sir.

Senator MORGAN. And the site for the locks on the right bank of the Chagres?

General HAINS. Yes, sir.

Senator MORGAN. Have you any misgivings as to the canal that is proposed to be built there—as to its permanency?

General HAINS. No, sir; I think the dam will be permanent and the site for the locks is a good one.

Senator MORGAN. Does it furnish an extensive length of earth, with sufficient foundation for three twin locks in flight, to accommodate a ship 900 feet long?

General HAINS. Ample.

General Abbott and General Ernst are equally as positive as General Hains that a dam can be safely constructed at Gatun on the plan as proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and that it will be permanent in its character.

Mr. Noble, who is well known to many Senators, and whose eminence in his profession is unquestioned, while he was before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was asked this question by Senator MORGAN:

That is what I am trying to get at—the common understanding—because we have to measure things by the common understanding. We do not understand it scientifically. Now, are you entirely satisfied, after a full and careful examination of the dam proposed by the minority of the Consulting Engineers at Gatun, that it is safe and satisfactory in every degree?

Mr. NOBLE. Entirely so.

Senator MORGAN. You think that is so?

Mr. NOBLE. I think that plan is entirely adequate for a dam at Gatun that will be safe and answer its purpose perfectly.

Mr. Harrod stated before the committee as follows:

I have confidence in the absolute stability and sufficient impermeability of the Gatun dam as designed. The experiments made and recited by Mr. Stearns and Mr. Noble give a scientific basis to such an opinion. It is not an engineering guess, in the present state of knowledge, to claim that percolation may be reduced to almost any extent by the increase of resistence through additional material and by the reduction of the hydraulic gradient. My experience with the levees of the Mississippi River, with which I was connected for twenty-six years as engineer for the State of Louisiana, and afterwards as a member of the Mississippi River Commission, confirms me in this view. These structures deal with the same problems of the stability of the embankment and seepage through the foundations as does the Gatun dam.

As I have already shown, Mr. Parsons admitted before our committee, in answer to a question propounded to him by Senator KNOX, that the dam would be a stable dam and that the lock-level type of canal is an entirely feasible plan of constructing the canal, and that, if it were a private enterprise, he should recommend that over the sea-level canal. It seems to me, Mr. President, that what I have shown here is sufficient to satisfy any unprejudiced mind that the dam at Gatun, proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, will be a permanent structure and will answer the purposes suggested in the plan of a lock-level canal. To my mind, the evidence is much stronger in support of the dam at Gatun than it is in favor of any of the dams that must be constructed under the sea-level plan. The destruction of any one of those dams would destroy the use of the sea-level canal, and the destruction of the one at Gamboa by any cause would be as disastrous to the sea-level canal as the destruction of the dam at Gatun would be to the lock-level canal. The men who have questioned the stability of the Gatun dam have not supported their criticisms by reasoning that will commend itself either to the scientist or to the layman. Professor Burr's attitude respecting this type of canal is so extreme as to weaken his entire estimate, and he has shown such a feeling in the case as to discount the credence that otherwise might be placed in some of his statements. The attitude of Mr. Wallace toward the Secretary of War, Governor Magoon, and Mr. Shonts is such, as shown by the testimony taken before our committee, that his evidence should have but little, if any, weight with Senators in determining the type of the canal that shall be approved by the Senate. Mr. Wallace is an intelligent man and, as the world goes, is an honest man; but his unfortunate connection with this great enterprise has put him in a position to absolutely destroy his credibility as a witness in this case.

As to the efficiency of the two types of canal, it seems to me that the clear preponderance of testimony is that the lock canal will be more efficient and will acommodate a larger commerce than the sea-level canal.

Mr. President, the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, in their report, state that the lock-level canal will have a greater capacity for traffic than the sea-level canal proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and that the lock-level canal proposed by them will furnish greater safety for ships and less danger of interruption of traffic by reason of the wider and deeper channels that the lock canal makes possible at smaller cost. They also claim that the lock canal will furnish a quicker passage across the Isthmus for large ships or a large traffic. Mr. Noble, a member of the Board of Consulting Engineers, in his testimony before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals on this subject, said:

The reason why the minority believe the lock canal to be superior to the sea level are given at the beginning of the minority report, substantially.

The first one was that the lock canal would have a greater capacity for traffic than that afforded by the narrow waterways proposed by the Board.

The ground for that is indicated by the calculated time required for transit across the Isthmus, on page 86 of the report, which shows a very rapid increase in time required to pass as the traffic increases; and we believe that before a great while after the completion of the canal—at any rate, before the traffic becomes very heavy—there would be at the Isthmus, as there is everywhere in the United States in narrow channels, a strong demand for the widening. That is the universal experience in every waterway, I think, in the United States. That feature of it is given somewhat in detail in one of the appendixes, where the successive stages of increasing the width and channels of the Great Lakes is dealt with.

The next reason was that we believed that the ships would pass through the lock canal with less danger to themselves and less danger of interrupting traffic. While recognizing that the locks themselves were a feature that we would gladly dispense with if other things were equal, the advantages of the broad navigation seemed to greatly outweigh the disadvantages attending the use of locks. The broader channels could not be interrupted by the sinking of a single boat, because there was so much room there, and there would be less danger of a ship colliding with the sides.

The sea-level canal has quite a length, between Bohio and Obispo, of narrow channel with rock not reaching to the top of the water, but still submerged; and I regard that, as the minority regarded it, as the most dangerous kind of a channel for a ship to traverse. If the vertical walls could be extended to the water line, it would be quite a different matter.

Senator HOPKINS. Just explain that fully, so that a layman may understand it without much reasoning on his own part.

Mr. NOBLE. A large vessel does not have a great deal of leeway on either side in a channel 200 feet wide. It will try to follow the center line very closely, but if by any want of judgment in steering, or by the effect of a cross wind, or anything like that, it does come in contact with the sides, in such a case as that the sharp rock strikes the boat in its weakest point—under water—which would almost inevitably cut a hole in the hull. At Suez they have a rock section, and they do not allow any meetings of any kind in that section. They regard it as their least safe section.

In the old days at Sault Ste. Marie, in the canal constructed by the State, the cutting was partly in rock, and near the head of the canal wholly in rock, and that was a fruitful source of injuries to ships; the bilge of the ship running upon those slopes, and the hull getting into contact with those sharp points causes a great many accidents. The accidents in the canal were in the waterway and not at the locks in those days. When the improvements of the canal were taken in hand by the General Government, the first improvement that the vessel interests demanded was to take out those slopes and put in vertical sides; and that was done. That work was completed in about 1874. Since that time there has been no trouble of that sort there.

In the sea-level canal, if two ships of medium size are about to meet, it will be necessary for one of them to make fast to mooring piles or posts while the other passes it at reduced speed. This is the universal practice in the Suez Canal. In that canal there are regular mooring places, where facilities are supplied for mooring one ship while the other passes at reduced speed. While, as was contended by Senator KITTREDGE in his remarks the other day, the bottom of the Suez Canal is only 108 feet in width, these mooring places, which are usually about 4 miles apart through the entire length of the canal, are widened to a distance of 150 feet at the bottom of the canal, and for a distance lengthwise of the canal 2,400 feet. Under the Spooner Act the Panama Canal must provide for larger ships than navigate the Suez Canal, and arrangements must therefore be made for widening places in the 150-foot channel of the Panama Canal for the passage of these ships. In the estimates of cost of the construction of the sea-level canal, no provision has been made for these passing places of ships. It is apparent, however, that if ships are to pass and repass each other at any points on the 19 miles or more of the sea-level canal where the prism does not exceed 150 feet, that the canal must be widened somewhat after the general plan adopted in the Suez Canal. Certainly two vessels with a breadth of beam of 80 feet each can not pass each other in a canal prism of 150 feet breadth at the bottom of the canal. This trouble will not be experienced in the lock-level canal. The broad channel of more than 1,000 feet near Gatun, with an elevation of 85 feet above the sea level, furnishes a lake as easily traversed as the sea, and vessels can pass and repass each other at any point in the canal down to the 200-foot width where the lock canal passes through the Culebra cut, and the vessels, except in the cut, can pass each other without slackening their speed.

Whenever the commerce of the canal reaches a point that thirty ships will pass and repass through the canal every day it is estimated by most competent engineers that there will be a saving, in the larger type of ships that pass through the canal, of three and one-half hours in favor of the lock canal. The minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, in discussing the question of the relative time taken for transit across the Isthmus, say, in speaking of the lock-level canal:

The saving of time by reducing the distance between passing places is apparent, but even for ships of the smaller type the lock canal will furnish quicker transit when the traffic becomes great, while for the larger ships the lock canal will afford quicker transit from the start. This would be still more marked for ships of the greater dimensions contemplated in the act of Congress.

In speaking further of the lock-level canal, the Board say:

In the narrow channels of the sea-level canal, with its large proportion of curves, night navigation will be more hazardous than by day, and ships will probably move at lower speed than assumed by the calculation of time of transit. Unless ships arrive very early in the day, they will not be able to pass through the canal by daylight on the day of arrival, but will have to submit to the delays of night navigation and tie up until the next day. While this may not appear to be an important matter, the loss from an average delay of twelve hours would amount to a large sum in a year. Taking, for example, a tonnage of 20,000,000, the annual loss on the basis of earnings of one-half mill per ton-mile would not be less than $1,500,000, which, capitalized at 3 per cent, shows an expenditure of $50,000,000 would be justified to avoid such a delay. It must be evident that even a small delay to the traffic is of much importance. By the adoption of a summit-level canal instead of a sea-level canal the time of transit is shortened, not only without additional cost, but with a large saving.

It is estimated by competent engineers that with twenty-five ships of the average size that are engaged in commerce passing every day through the two types proposed for the canal, it would take ten and three-tenths hours for the passage through the sea-level canal and nine and eight-tenths hours for the passage through the lock level, and with thirty ships per day of the average size of first-class ships, it would be eleven and one-tenth hours for the sea-level and ten hours for the lock level, so that with the average first-class ships which would use the canal the moment the commerce becomes such that twenty-five or thirty ships per day pass or repass the time in transit is clearly in favor of the lock canal, and, as I have already said, with the ships of the larger type there would be a much greater saving, namely, three and one-half hours in time in favor of the lock canal.

Our cruisers and battle ships would pass through the lock-level canal much easier and with greater safety than they could pass through the sea-level canal proposed by the majority of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. The sea-level canal between Bohio and Obispo has a very difficult channel, with rock not reaching to the top of the water, but submerged. Between these points it would be very dangerous to navigate our cruisers and battle ships. The danger there is much greater than the danger would be in lifting them by locks into the lock-level canal, and the time of transit across the Isthmus, as already appears, would be much less for that type and size of ships than could be had on the sea-level canal. Those who favor a sea-level canal have undertaken to show that there is danger in the flight of locks proposed to be constructed at Gatun. After a careful study of what the most eminent engineers of the age have said upon this subject, I confess that I do not share this apprehension. I have become convinced from my study of the subject that there is little, if any, real danger in operating the flight of locks at Gatun. If there is a danger, it is the danger that every man takes when he rides upon a railroad train. There is danger everywhere and in all kinds of undertakings. No man is sure when he leaves the Senate for his home that he will not be run down by an automobile or a runaway team, but that does not deter him from leaving this Chamber and going to his home when the labors of the session are closed. The danger that is spoken of in operating this flight of locks is just such a danger as a man encounters in going to and from his place of business every day, and as every person assumes who gets upon a railroad train and starts from Washington to New York or Chicago. There may be a possibility that before the passenger reaches his destination he may be injured, but the possibility is so remote that it does not deter him from undertaking the trip. Just so in the construction and use of the flight of locks at the Gatun dam. There is theoretically a danger in operating the locks, but that theoretical danger has been minimized by engineering science in the construction and operation of the locks themselves.

The locks at St. Marys Falls have been in operation for fifty years and only three accidents have occurred there, and they have been provided against in the plans that have been suggested by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers in the construction and operation of the locks at Gatun.

Some of the witnesses have spoken of accidents that occurred at Manchester and at other points, but, as Mr. Noble said when his attention was called to this, the fault was not in the use of locks, but that the locks and the method of operating them were not up to date; that if, at Manchester, they had had the modern appliances that are used at St. Marys the accident that has been exploited before our committee and by Senator KITTREDGE in his statement here the other day would not have occurred. When this question was being considered by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I put this question to Mr. Noble, who, at the time, was a witness before the committee:

Something was said by one of the witnesses with reference to the danger of a lock canal to vessels in going in and out of the locks. Have you had any experience or observation that will enable you to give us any news as to the character of that danger and the extent of it?

Mr. NOBLE. I was at the St. Marys Falls Canal for about twelve years in local charge of the work of improvement there. During the last year I was the superintendent of the canal for operation also. I observed closely all that was going on during the entire twelve years, and there was never any serious accident at the gates or to the lock in any way caused by the movement of vessels.

Senator HOPKINS. Well, do you, from your experience, regard the construction of a two or three lock system at Gatun as being at all dangerous to navigation?

Mr. NOBLE. I think the danger is inappreciable. I base that upon the experience had at the Soo for more than fifty years, where no serious injury has ever been done to a ship at the lock.

Senator HOPKINS. The witness who was here yesterday—Mr. Parsons, I think—spoke about some accidents at Manchester.

Senator DRYDEN. When the lock was absolutely crushed down—broken down.

Senator HOPKINS. Under what conditions could such an accident as that occur?

Mr. NOBLE. The locks at Manchester are not provided with suitable approach walls, and vessels are not under control by lines until they get to the lock itself. That is my recollection of all the locks, and I have examined the drawings of the Manchester canal since this discussion was commenced, and they conform to that. At the St. Marys Falls Canal there are long vertical walls leading to every lock, and at the upstream end those walls are more than a mile in length, and at the downstream end perhaps they are 2,000 feet in length.

Vessels come to a stop, or at least come to a very slow movement, and before they are allowed to approach the locks they are required to have out a number of lines which lock tenders carry from snubbing post to snubbing post, ready to put them on at any time. Those facilities and those approach walls are very essential for the safe navigation of a canal. I do not believe that if they had had them provided at Manchester those accidents would have occurred.

At the Kiel Canal they have a floating platform attached to mooring piles that is very much inferior to an approach wall. If a vessel touches them and then heels over a bit they are apt to roll over. They have that same appliance at the Canadian canal, Sault Ste. Marie, where, for the whole length of the canal itself, not immediately at the locks, the rock is left somewhat rough; and in order to protect vessels they have a timber fender alongside which now and then gets rolled over.

I think with suitable approach walls so that vessels can be brought under control or stopped if necessary or thought advisable, before they get to a lock, the dangers are rendered very small indeed. Then, by the provision of the additional gates, which the minority report suggests, so that there will always be two pairs closed against an approaching ship from the upper level, there does not seem to be enough risk left for the liviliest imagination to make anything out of. That seems to be so absolutely demonstrated by the fifty years' experience at the Soo that I hardly see how it could be questioned.

Mr. Stearns who is a recognized authority on this subject, in speaking of the question of the safety of the locks was questioned by me as follows:

As I understand you, it is a very remote contingency that there would ever be accidents in the locks?

Mr. STEARNS. It has never happened with any canal in the world with only single gates so as to cause disaster. It breaks the gate; but with these double-gate precautions, and all the provisions that can be made in management to take care of the matter, I do not believe there is the slightest danger.

The minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers in discussing the question raised as to the safety of the locks, etc., at Gatun, say:

We believe that in no ship canal in the world has such a disaster occurred as that imagined for the Panama Canal. If the accidents at the Manchester Canal show that gates may be struck and destroyed, they also show that disaster may be averted even without special safeguards. Of all the possible movements of a ship at canal locks the one that involves the most danger of opening a summit level is when a ship bound down in that level approaches a lock, but by proper safeguards this can be made very small. If a gate is struck by a ship upward bound, the water pressure on the opposite of the gate helps to resist the blow. By the use of two pairs of gates at each end of the summit lock all danger of opening the summit level by a blow on the down-stream side of the lower gates is eliminated, as will be shown a little further on.

The canal construction should provide long approach walls at each end of every lock or flight of locks, so that lines can be put out quickly and handled readily and the ship held under perfect control. For this important purpose a long, solid pier with suitable snubbing posts is vastly superior to mooring piles and floats, such as are used in some foreign canals. No canal in Europe is adequately provided in this respect, and the apprehensions of some members of the Board in regard to the hazards of navigation through lock canals may be due to the fact that their experience has been entirely with canals having this radical defect. With suitable approach piers and with rules duly enforced requiring ships to put out lines on arriving at the pier and to reduce speed to 2 miles per hour when moving along it, or to stop altogether several hundred feet from the lock, a great degree of security can be obtained. Such approach piers are provided in the lock plan herein recommended. This plan also provides two pairs of gates at the head and two at the foot of each summit lock, so that a ship will always find two pairs of gates shut against it. * * *

The provision of duplicate locks at each end of a lock herein adopted is an unusual precaution. It has been recently adopted in part at the St. Marys Falls Canal, where duplicate gates are now operated regularly at the lower end of the Poe lock, but the upper end is not similarly protected. In the additional lock now projected at that canal, safety gates are to be provided at each end. The approach piers, the extent of which greatly affect the safety of a lock, are excellent at the St. Marys Falls Canal and far better than at any other ship canal, and doubtless have contributed to the remarkable record of immunity from serious accidents.

This canal has now been in operation a little more than fifty years, and a traffic aggregating about 360,000,000 tons net register has passed through it with no accidents seriously obstructing navigation. It is the best example existing not only of the capacity of a lock canal for a great traffic, but of the safety with which this traffic can be handled with suitable equipment.

It seems to me, Mr. President, after studying the opinions of such eminent men as I have here quoted, that the danger in the use of a lock canal is more imaginary than real. With the precautions that have been taken in the plans for the construction of the locks at Gatun by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, it seems to me that, as stated by Mr. Noble, the danger is inappreciable.

Mr. President, I have taken more of the time of Senators than was my purpose when I rose to address them this afternoon. There are a number of other questions that I should like to discuss before I close, but the lateness of the hour will not permit. I have only undertaken to discuss the leading points in the two types of canal, and to show to Senators, in the first place, that the sea-level canal as proposed by the majority here will be a failure, so far as the expectations of the American people are concerned, if it is constructed as they propose. I have next undertaken to show, Mr. President, that the lock canal is not only feasible, but, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, many of the engineers prefer it to the sea-level canal. I have shown that if we adopt the sea-level plan we will incur an expenditure of from a hundred and twenty-five to a hundred and ninety million dollars more than will be necessary to give us the best lock canal ever constructed. I have also shown that the lock canal can be constructed in eight or nine years, less than one-half the time that will be required to construct the sea-level canal.

With these great considerations before us, it seems to me that Senators here, regardless of political affiliation, regardless of their previous ideas as to the type of canal that should be constructed, should one and all reject the majority report here and say to the President and to the House of Representatives: "We will join with you in the construction of a lock canal, and will show to the American people that their expectations will be realized, and that before this generation passes away the great ships of commerce will be traversing this canal from one great ocean to the other."

Mr. KITTREDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from South Dakota if he proposes to go on with the discussion of the unfinished business this evening?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will temporarily be laid aside.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, may be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 3, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the secretary to the Engineer Commissioner from $2,160 to $2,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 2, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the janitor of the executive office of the Commissioners from $900 to $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 9, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the executive office of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from $98,079 to $98,469.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 11, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "five;" so as to read:

For assessor's office: For assessor, $3,500, and $500 additional as chairman of the excise and personal tax boards, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items of appropriation for the assessor's office, on page 5, line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "five;" and in line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "and the assessor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to accept, without penalty, all returns of gross earnings made by companies or corporations on or before October 18, 1905, as if the same had been made on the 1st day of August, 1905;" so as to read:

Three assistant assessors, at $3,000 each; clerk to board of assistant assessors, $1,500; messenger and driver for board of assistant assessors, $600; temporary clerk hire, $500; in all, $43,500; and the assessor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to accept, without penalty, all returns of gross earnings made by companies or corporations on or before October 18, 1905, as if the same had been made on the 1st day of August, 1905.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 10, after the word "dollars," to insert "one clerk, $1,200;" and in line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three thousand six" and insert "four thousand eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Excise board: For chief clerk, $2,000; clerk, $1,200; clerk, $1,000; messenger, $600; in all, $4,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 18, before the word "inspectors," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" and in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirteen thousand six hundred" and insert "seventeen thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Personal tax board: For two assistant assessors of personal taxes, at $3,000 each; appraiser of personal property, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; assistant clerk, $1,000; four inspectors, at $1,200 each; extra clerk hire, $2,000; in all, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "messenger, $480;" and in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "six hundred and thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

For auditor's office: For auditor, $3,600; * * * deputy disbursing officer, $1,500; messenger, $480; in all, $30,630.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert "hostler and laborer, $356;" and in line 15, before the word "dollars," to insert "three hundred and sixty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For coroner's office: For coroner, $1,800; morgue master, $720; assistant morgue master and janitor, $480; hostler and laborer, $365; in all, $3,365.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 17, after the word "each," to strike out "one market master, $600;" in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight hundred" and insert "nine hundred and twenty;" and in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight hundred" and insert "four hundred and eighty;" so as to make the clause read:

For market masters: For two market masters, at $1,200 each; for necessary labor for cleaning Eastern, Western, and Georgetown market houses, $1,920; in all, $4,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items of appropriation for the engineer's office, on page 12, line 24, to increase the appropriation for the salary of skilled laborer (now employed at $2 per diem) from $600 to $625.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 14, before the word "oilers," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" in the same line, before the word "firemen," to strike out "six" and insert "five;" in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty" and insert "seventy-five;" in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "nine hundred and fifty;" and in line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-eight thousand four hundred and twenty-seven" and insert "seventy-nine thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven;" so as to read:

Three assistant steam engineers, at $1,050 each; five oilers, at $600 each; five firemen, at $875 each; superintendent of repairs, $1,500; clerk, $1,050; clerk, $620; driver, $540; superintendent of stables, $1,950; blacksmith, $975; two watchmen, at $630 each; two drivers, at $630 each; in all, $179,737.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand and fifty;" in line 15, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" in line 20, after the word "dollars," to insert "hostler, $480;" in line 21, before the word "dumpmen," to strike out "nine" and insert "eight;" and in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty" and insert "forty-five thousand three hundred and seventy;" so as to make the clause read:

Street-sweeping office: For superintendent, $2,500; * * * stable foreman, $1,050; foreman of repairs, $1,000; clerk, $1,500; clerk, $1,200; stenographer and clerk, $720; blacksmith, $900; mechanic, $780; mechanic's helper, $600; hostler, $550; hostler, $480; eight dumpmen, at $480 each; one laborer, $450; in all, $45,370.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "statistician, $1,500;" in line 7, after the word "dollars," to strike out "statistician, $1,400;" and in line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Department of insurance: For superintendent of insurance $3,000; examiner, $1,500; statistician, $1,500; clerk, $1,000; stenographer, $660; temporary clerk hire, $1,200; in all, $8,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "assistant computer, $825;" in line 22, before the word "three," to strike out "rodman, $825," and insert "two rodmen, at $825 each;" and on page 16, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty thousand three hundred and seventy-nine;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor's office: For surveyor, $3,000; * * * assistant computer, $825; two rodmen, at $825 each; three chainmen, at $700 each; * * * in all, $22,029.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 7, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For services of temporary draftsmen, computers, laborer, and drivers when required, and for an additional field party when required, all expenditures under this sum to be made only on the written authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 8, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the engineer's office from $24,379 to $26,529.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert "chief of circulating department, $1,000; children's librarian, $1,000;" in line 15, before the word "assistants," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" in line 24, before the word "attendants," to strike out "five" and insert "eight;" on page 17, line 2, before the word "pages," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten;" and in line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-six thousand three hundred and forty" and insert "thirty thousand eight hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

Free public library: For librarian, $3,000; assistant librarian, $1,200; chief of circulating department, $1,000; children's librarian, $1,000; assistant, $900; five assistants, at $720 each; * * * three attendants, at $480 each; eight attendants, at $360 each; collator, $360; two messengers, at $360 each; ten pages, at $240 each; * * * in all, $30,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 19, to increase the appropriation for purchase of books for the free public library from $7,500 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 21, to increase the appropriation for binding for free public library from $3,000 to $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 24, to increase the total of the appropriation for the maintenance of the free public library from $17,500 to $20,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses," to increase the appropriation in the item for the contingent expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for printing, checks, books, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, stationery, etc., from $40,000 to $42,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 15, to increase the appropriation for judicial expenses, including procurement of chains of title, the printing of briefs in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, etc., from $1,000 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 22, to increase the appropriation for livery of horse or horse hire for coroner's office, jurors' fees, witness fees, etc., from $2,500 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 3, to insert:

For the erection by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of suitable tablets to mark historical places in said District, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 13, after the word "typewriters," to insert "except in those cases where the use of a pen shall be found by the recorder to be necessary;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia to secure for use in his office, by purchase and exchange, twenty Elliott-Fisher book typewriters, $2,150: Provided, That hereafter the recording of all instruments filed for record in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia shall be done with book typewriters, except in those cases where the use of a pen shall be found by the recorder to be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 14, to insert:

The recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, with the approval of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or of one of its justices appointed by it for that purpose, is hereby authorized and directed to recopy from time to time such of the original records in his office as may, in their judgment, need to be recopied in order to properly preserve them, the expense thereof to be paid by him out of the fees and emoluments of his office when approved and certified by the supreme court of the District or one of its justices appointed for the purpose, and audited and allowed by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury: Provided, That the compensation paid for such work shall not exceed that now allowed by law for copying in said office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Improvements and repairs," on page 24, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six" and insert "seventy thousand;" so as to read:

Work on streets and avenues: For work on streets and avenues named in Appendix W, Book of Estimates, 1907, $70,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Commissioners upon streets and avenues specified in the schedules named in said appendix and in the aggregate for each schedule as stated herein, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 6, under the subhead "Work on streets and avenues," to increase the appropriation for the Georgetown schedule from $2,000 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 7, to increase the appropriation for the northwest section schedule from $5,333 to $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 9, to increase the appropriation for the southwest section schedule from $8,000 to $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 11, to increase the appropriation for the southeast section schedule from $15,333 to $23,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 13, to increase the appropriation for the northeast section schedule from $16,000 to $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who has charge of the bill, whether in reference to the extension of new streets the owners of adjoining property are made to pay for the grading of those streets in the first instance? I notice that in this city, especially toward the northwest, men buy up large tracts of property and plat it and lay it out, and the question is whether they contribute anything to these street improvements, or does it all come out of the city government and out of the United States? What is the rule in that respect?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that there is no rule which does not vary with circumstances. It is a very common thing for the owners to dedicate the streets to the Government.

Mr. NELSON. I do not mean the land, but, for instance, there is an extension. A man lays out an addition in the suburbs of the city. Of course when he plats that ground the street is dedicated to the public; but when it comes to improving the streets that are thus dedicated, does not the property contribute anything toward that expense, or does it come out of the general fund?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it comes out of the general fund, as a rule.

Mr. NELSON. In that respect, then, it differs from what takes place in most other towns. I inquire why it would not be fair and just to make the people who lay out those additions bear a part of the burden of the street improvements, instead of throwing it upon the public at large, and in that way helping them to boom and enhance their property?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, as a rule, it is thought that if they dedicate the street, which is a very considerable part of the expense, they have contributed their portion; and then, from time to time, by appropriations, the streets are improved. I do not know just what procedure the Senator would suggest whereby we could make them pay for paving the street or improving it in the ordinary way.

Mr. NELSON. They do it in other towns. In the West they are always made to contribute. I call the attention of the committee to the fact, so that in the future provision may be made for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The rule is different here, I will say to the Senator.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 25, after line 13, to insert:

Replacing granite block pavement with asphalt on the following streets:

First street between B and C streets NW., $5,800.
Second street between B and C streets NW., $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 3, to insert:

Opening alleys and minor streets: For opening, widening, and extending alleys and minor streets in the District of Columbia under the provisions of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, $50,000, to be paid wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia, and this sum, together with any balance of appropriations heretofore made for said purpose, shall be available for use in opening, widening, extending, and straightening alleys and minor streets under the provisions of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; and the Commissioners of said District are hereby authorized to employ, for such time as may be necessary, an assistant to the corporation counsel, at a compensation of $150 a month, whose duty it shall be to institute proceedings for the condemnations necessary to be taken in opening, widening, extending, and straightening alleys and minor streets, and the compensation of such assistant to the corporation counsel shall be included in the costs and expenses of such proceedings and shall be assessed against lands benefited by reason of such opening, extension, widening, and straightening, as provided in section 1608 of said Code of Law; said appropriation to be reimbursed by the payment of assessments for benefits to be made under the provisions of said Code.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 4, to insert:

Massachusetts avenue, grade and improve, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 6, to insert:

Connecticut avenue extended, grade and improve, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 8, to insert:

Lincoln road, north of R street, grade and improve, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 10, to insert:

Pennsylvania avenue extended, grade and improve, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 12, to insert:

Brookland avenue, Bunker Hill road to Bates road, grade, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 14, to insert:

Nichols avenue, Anacostia, grade and improve, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 16, to insert:

Streets in American University Park, grade and improve, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 18, to insert:

Albemarle street, east of Connecticut avenue, grade, $9,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 20, to insert:

T street, North Capitol street to First street, west, pave, $6,850.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the word "dollars," in line 22, I move to strike out "six thousand eight hundred and fifty" and to insert "seven thousand three hundred and fifty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 22, to insert:

Chesapeake street, Rockville road to Grant road, grade and improve, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 24, to insert:

Thirteenth street, Clifton to Euclid (Roanoke) street, pave, $4,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 26, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out "four thousand" and insert "five thousand three hundred."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 28, to insert:

Girard street, between Twelfth street and Brentwood road, northeast, grade and improve, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 2, to insert:

Massachusetts avenue from Sheridan circle to Decatur street, pave, $3,400.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 3 I move to strike out "Decatur" and to insert "Twenty-fourth."

Mr. KEAN. Why not insert "P street," so as to complete the whole improvement?

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee did not think that was wise this year. We have to deal with another body in these appropriations, and we have added very largely to the appropriations for streets.

I move further to amend the amendment by striking out, before the word "thousand," the word "three," and inserting "five" in line 4, so as to read "$5,400." This, I will say to the Senator, carries the improvements a little beyond the point where any houses have been built, and I think we are doing pretty well.

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator will extend it as far as S street he will cover the whole thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we have done pretty well on that street for this year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves first to amend the amendment by striking out "Decatur" and inserting "Twenty-fourth" before the word "street" in line 3.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves further to amend the amendment by striking out "$3,400" and insering "$5,400" in line 4.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 4, to insert:

Florida avenue between P and Q streets NW., city of Washington, contiguous to Twenty-second street and north of the south line of lot 24, block 3, of Kalorama Heights addition to the city of Washington, pave, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 9, to insert:

Minnesota avenue from Pennsylvania avenue northward as far as the land may have been dedicated therefor, widening and grading, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 12, to insert:

Kalorama road from Columbia road to Nineteenth street extended, pave, $1,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I wish again to call the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge to the appropriations on page 27 and a large portion of page 28. They are all appropriations for such street improvements as in all other cities than Washington would be borne in the first instance by the adjoining lot owners.

In all other cities of the country, so far as I know, in the case of such improvements, when they first lay out and improve streets and put them in a passable condition, the expense is paid by the adjoining lot owners. After such streets are once laid out and improved and graded then the city or municipality has charge of the improvements.

The tendency of this method of appropriation is to work indirectly into the hands of land speculators and lot owners. I am not here criticising and finding fault with the committee for taking this course, because they have followed a course, I am aware, that has existed for a long time, perhaps from the very beginning, so far as I know, in this city. But it is a course entirely different from that pursued in all other towns, and to my mind it is not only unjust to the taxpayers generally of this city, but also to the people of the United States, who contribute half of this money, that they should bear the burden of these improvements.

I do not expect the committee to do it now, but I think in the future the committee ought to devise a system by which in all these cases the adjoining lot owners should contribute their share to the street improvements in the first instance. It would not only be intrinsically just and honest and follow the procedure in other towns, but it would also tend to repress somewhat the booming and speculation in suburban property.

Men now find it very easy to buy a tract of suburban land and immediately go to work and plat it into lots and streets, and perhaps here and there place a little park in it. Then the first thing they do is to come to Congress and say, "I have platted this addition and laid out streets here, and I have dedicated this land to the public. I want you, the people of the District of Columbia and the people of the United States, to go into your pockets and raise money to improve the streets and put them into such a condition that I can sell my lots to good advantage and make money out of it."

It is a matter of speculation on the part of these men to make money out of the property that they thus plat and lay out, and that the public at large in this District should contribute to that expense in the first instance and enable the speculators to make that money, it seems to me, is altogether unjust.

I want the Senator who has this bill in charge to understand that I am not criticising him. I am criticising the system.

Mr. President, it is a wrong system. We ought to adopt the system in respect to these street extensions and street matters, in the first instance, that prevails in all other large towns of this country. I sincerely trust that when the committee frame the next appropriation bill they will take the proper steps to put the city in this respect upon a par with the other cities of this country. We certainly are under no obligations to the real estate boomers and real estate speculators, and we ought not to contribute money to enhance and boom their property and enable them to make a big fat thing out of this system of speculation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator is wrong in saying that every other municipality than Washington pursues that course. But, however that may be, these men first dedicate the land, then they pay a portion of the curb and the sidewalk—one-half in the matter of sidewalk; I am not quite sure whether they pay 50 per cent or the entire amount for the curb.

Mr. NELSON. Only 50 per cent, I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. In some instances there have been entire sidewalks paved and concreted by the owners of property; but to say that that should be a fast rule would work, I think, great injustice. If the Senator will go within a stone's throw almost of the Capitol, in the southeastern part of this city, he will find property that has been paying taxes for more than a hundred years, and the streets are not yet paved. To say that the people who have held that property and paid taxes on it should be required to make all the improvements in those streets is, to my mind, an injustice that the Senator would not advocate if he investigated the matter.

Then, again, the streets are not paved for the benefit of the owners of the property alone. They are to be traversed by all the people. A paved street is a public highway, and I think it would be a manifest injustice to require the people who chance to have lots adjoining the street to pay the entire expense of the improvement.

Mr. NELSON. I do not mean that they should pay the entire expense, but I mean that they should contribute something. They contribute now, as I understand it, one-half toward the paving of the sidewalks in the first instance. I think they ought to contribute a similar amount to the paving of the streets.

The Senator referred to southeast Washington. When the town was originally laid out that portion was built up, and the streets were not paved. The paving has been going on gradually. The property was developed, occupied, and settled upon, and buildings were constructed along those streets, and for many years the public at large used them. I do not think the rule should apply in that case, but when persons lay out entirely new land that has never been occupied or used before, and lay it out as a mere matter of speculation, then I think they ought to bear a part of the burden. And such a rule would repress some of the real estate speculation that is so rampant in this city.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no particular sympathy with real estate speculators, but I think any Senator who will take the trouble to cool himself off by riding on the rapid-transit cars of this city on a hot evening of a June day will feel that we are under great obligations to the enterprising men who have gone outside and opened up subdivisions and made it possible to have the beautiful homes that we find within 4 or 5 miles of the Capitol.

I do not know how much money they have made. They deserve to make money. Their enterprise is worthy, and it has done very much to make Washington the beautiful city that it is.

However, Mr. President, I have not charge of the appropriations. In the first place, the bill comes from the House of Representatives, and I am only to-day serving by being drafted into the service in taking charge of this bill. I will personally give consideration to the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota, simply adding the suggestion that if he should be in my position as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia he would find more trouble than he has discovered in all his life in every other avenue of business that he may have been engaged in.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 29, line 13, to increase the total of the appropriation for the construction of county roads from $45,800 to $139,300.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary states that the total should be $143,100.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are certain totals that the clerks at the desk will attend to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 14, to insert:

For condemnation of land necessary for extending Massachusetts avenue from the present point of termination of the macadam pavement near the Naval Observatory to Nebraska avenue, and toward grading and improving said part of Massachusetts avenue, $25,000, the proceedings for condemnation hereunder to be in accordance with the terms and provisions of sections 491a to 491n, inclusive, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia as established by act of Congress approved April 30, 1906, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia,' regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets."

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 16, I move to strike out, after the word "from," the words "the present point of termination of the macadam pavement near the Naval Observatory" and to insert "Wisconsin avenue;" so as to read:

For condemnation of land necessary for extending Massachusetts avenue from Wisconsin avenue to Nebraska avenue, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, on page 30, line 8, to increase the appropriation for current work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, etc., from $275,000 to $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 18, to increase the appropriation for replacing and repairing sidewalks and curbs around public reservations and municipal buildings from $6,000 to $9,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 11, to insert:

For continuation of work on the reconstruction of the Anacostia Bridge, $275,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Sewers," on page 31, line 16, to increase the appropriation for cleaning and repairing sewers and basins from $37,500 to $38,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 1, to increase the appropriation for suburban sewers from $44,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 16, to insert:

For beginning work on extension of east side intercepting sewer from boundary sewer to Brookland, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Streets," on page 33, line 19, to increase the appropriation for sprinkling, sweeping, and cleaning from $225,000 to $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 24, to increase the appropriation for cleaning snow and ice from cross walks and gutters, under the act approved March 2, 1895, from $2,500 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "fifteen;" and in the same line, before the word "thousand," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "eight" and insert "eighteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Bathing beach: For superintendent, $600; watchman, $450; and for temporary services, maintenance, and repairs, $1,950; construction of bath houses and for improvement of wharves and floating baths, $15,000; in all, $18,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 21, before the word "repair," to insert "purchase;" and in line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For public scales: For purchase, repair, and replacement of public scales, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 24, before the word "repair," to insert "purchase, replacement, and;" and on page 35, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

For public pumps: For the purchase, replacement, and repair of public pumps, cleaning and protecting public wells, filling abandoned or condemned public wells, including the hire and maintenance of necessary horse and wagon, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 3, after the word "maintenance," to insert "supervision;" and in line 4, before the word "equipment," to strike out "completing;" so as to make the clause read:

Playgrounds: For maintenance, supervision, and equipment of outdoor playgrounds, $10,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 14, to insert:

For reconstructing wharf and sea wall adjacent to the morgue, as a foundation to stable, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 16, to insert:

Condemnation of insanitary buildings: For all expenses necessary and incident to the enforcement of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 1, 1906, including personal services, when authorized by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, not to exceed $1,200, $6,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Electrical department," on page 37, line 10, to increase the appropriation for general supplies, repairs, new batteries, and battery supplies, telephone rental and purchase, etc., from $12,000 to $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 22, to insert:

For a telephone switch board, to be installed in the office of the major and superintendent of police, connecting the various precincts, the residences of his assistants, and the main offices of his department on an independent system, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 2, to insert:

For purchasing and cost of replacing the present break wheels in fire-alarm boxes with approved type of platinum-point key breaks, $1,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 19, before the word "thousand," to insert "and sixty;" in line 20, before the words "dollars," to strike out "fifteen," and insert "twenty;" and in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-six;" so as to read:

Lighting: For illuminating material, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, and cleaning public lamps on avenues, streets, roads, and alleys; purchasing and expense of erecting and maintaining new lamp-posts, street designations, lanterns, and fixtures; moving lamp-posts, painting lamp-posts and lanterns; replacing and repairing lamp-posts and lanterns damaged or unfit for service; for rent of storeroom, cartage of material, livery, and other necessary items, $260,000: Provided, That no more than $20 per annum shall be paid for each gas lamp equipped with a self-regulating flat-flame burner so adjusted as to secure under all ordinary variations of pressure and density a consumption of 5 cubic feet of gas per hour, nor more than $26 per annum for each gas or oil lamp equipped with an incandescent mantle burner of not not less than 60 candlepower.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty" and insert "ninety-five;" and in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty" and insert "eighty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For electric arc lighting, and for extensions of such service, not exceeding $95,000: Provided, That not more than $85 per annum shall be paid for any electric arc light burning from fifteen minutes after sunset to forty-five minutes before sunrise, and operated wholly by means of underground wire; and each arc light shall be of not less than 1,000 actual candlepower, and no part of this appropriation shall be used for electric lighting by means of wires that may exist on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to items under the heading "Public schools," line 25, page 40.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, we have reached "Public schools," and as the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of the bill knows, there is the bill on the Calendar of the Senate for amending the schedule of salaries of teachers in the public schools. Of course, if that bill passes, all the items in this bill pertaining to public schools will have to be gone over again. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he would be willing to yield to me to call up the House bill 18442, pertaining to the public schools. It is not a very long bill. I think we could pass it very quickly, and that would give a chance to change the schedule here to conform to the new law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very desirous of pleasing the Senator from Nebraska in the matter he has in charge and in which he has taken a great deal of interest, but I will venture to suggest to the Senator that I think the better way will be for me to move to strike out of the bill at the present time everything relating to the public schools and then go along with the bill, and a little later this evening, or perhaps to-morrow, the Senator from Nebraska can get his bill up. If it passes the schedule will have to be made up, which will take a little time, and it can be inserted. Of course the Senate could recede from the amendment and reinsert the old schedule. I think that will facilitate matters, rather than for me to yield for the Senator to call his bill up at the present time.

Mr. BURKETT. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will state that it seemed to me we could straighten this matter out and pass the bill to which I refer this evening. It would not perhaps take over fifteen minutes. Then, during the evening or before the Senate convenes to-morrow, the Senator in charge of the bill could straighten it out and we could go right on in the regular order. If we go on now, however, without doing so, we shall have to go back to it later on. It will be necessary, therefore, to delay the appropriation bill at some time unless this schedule of salaries is now arranged. I merely thought perhaps we had better do it while the Senate is on the subject than to have it go over until to-morrow forenoon and then have to correct it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that Senators around me say they would object to that arrangement. So that would seem to settle the matter for this evening.

I will now ask, Mr. President, that all matters relating to public schools be passed over for the present, and that the consideration of the bill be proceeded with, beginning on page 45, at line 2. That relates to janitors and the care of buildings and grounds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the reading of the bill will be resumed by the Secretary at the point indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 46, line 13, to increase the appropriation for janitors and care of buildings and grounds of the Adams, Addison, Ambush, Amidon, Anthony Bowen, Arthur, and other schools from $540 each to $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 15, to increase the appropriation for janitors and care of buildings and grounds of the Garfield, Thomson, Van Buren Annex, and Woodburn buildings from $360 each to $420 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 20, to increase the appropriation for janitors and care of buildings and grounds of the Benning (white), Benning (colored), Chevy Chase, Stanton, Hamilton, and other schools from $240 each to $360 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 2, to increase the appropriation for care of smaller buildings and rented rooms, including cooking and manual training schools, etc., from $5,000 to $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, after line 11, to insert:

For one cabinetmaker for repairing school furniture, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the public schools of the District from $90,240 to $98,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 1, after the word

"buildings," to insert "storage and stock rooms;" so as to make the clause read:

Miscellaneous: For rent of school buildings, storage and stock rooms, and repair shop, $15,684.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 3, to insert:

For amount required to rent, equip, and care for temporary rooms for classes above the second grade, now on half time, and to provide for the estimated increased enrollment that may be caused by the operation of the compulsory education law, $27,372.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 14, to increase the appropriation for necessary repairs to and changes in plumbing in existing school buildings from $40,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 13, to insert:

For additional amount to complete the equipment of the new Business High School, $7,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 16, to insert:

For the purchase of apparatus for the physics department and the installation of an electrical equipment in the physics laboratories in those high schools which do not now possess the same, namely, the Central, Eastern, Western, and M Street High Schools, including conduits, switchboards with usual fittings, wires and wiring, terminal boxes, motor generators or dynamotors, transformers, resistance boxes, electrical measuring instruments, and other accessories and extra labor and other necessary items, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 5, to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses, including furniture and repairs of same, books, books of reference, etc., from $39,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 13, to increase the appropriation for purchase of pianos for school buildings and kindergarten schools from $2,000 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 6, to increase the appropriation for apparatus for the equipment and maintenance of school playgrounds from $1,500 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 7, to insert:

For the purchase of plants, seeds, tools, and other materials, and labor, for school gardens, wherever located, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 16, to insert:

For purchase of lot 25, square 553, adjoining Armstrong Manual Training School, as a site for the erection of an addition to said school, $3,933.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 20, to insert:

For site and toward the construction of an eight-room school building to relieve the McCormick School, $40,000; and the total cost of said building, including cost of site, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 53, to insert:

For site and erection of a four-room building in Brightwood Park (seventh division), $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I now ask to return to page 28 of the bill, where an omission occurred. After line 14, on that page, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 14, on page 28, it is proposed to insert:

Fifteenth street, Florida avenue to Euclid (Erie) street, grade and improve, $5,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The adoption of that amendment makes an amendment of the total necessary on page 29, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, lines 13 and 14, it is proposed to change the total appropriation to $148,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 53, after line 2, to insert:

For site and construction of one four-room building at Deanwood (eleventh division), $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "For Metropolitan police," on page 54, line 17, after the word "dollars," to strike out "captain and assistant superintendent, $1,800," and insert "assistant superintendent, with rank of inspector, $2,500; three inspectors, at $1,800 each;" in line 21, before the word "captains," to strike out "four" and insert "ten;" and, on page 55, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred and forty" and insert "six hundred;" so as to read:

For major and superintendent, $4,000; assistant superintendent, with rank of inspector, $2,500; three inspectors, at $1,800 dollars each; ten captains, at $1,500 each; chief clerk, who shall also be property clerk, $2,000 dollars; clerk, $1,500; clerk, $900; two clerks, at $720 each, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 54 I move to strike out part of lines 24 and 25 and to insert in lieu thereof the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendement proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, in line 25, it is proposed to strike out "clerk, $900; two clerks, at $720 each," and to insert "three clerks, at $900 each."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 55, line 1, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred and forty" and insert "six hundred;" so as to read:

Four surgeons of the police and fire departments, at $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the Metropolitan police, on page 55, line 5, after the word "necessary," to strike out:

Eleven lieutenants, at $1,320 each; 40 sergeants, at $1,140 each; 370 privates, class 1, at $900 each; 265 privates, class 2, at $1,080 each.

And to insert:

Twelve lieutenants, one of whom shall be harbor master, at $1,320 each; 45 sergeants, one of whom may be detailed for duty in the harbor patrol, at $1,250 each; 412 privates of class 3, at $1,200 each; 104 privates of class 2, at $1,080 each; 143 privates of class 1, at $900 each; for amount required to pay salaries of privates of class 2 who will be promoted to class 3 and privates of class 1 who will be promoted to class 2, during the fiscal year 1907, $5,979.01.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 23, before the word "telephone," to strike out "three" and insert "six;" in line 24, after the word "each," to strike out "twenty-four station keepers, at $840 each;" on page 56, line 5, before the word "mounted," to strike out "captain" and insert "inspector;" in line 6, before the word "lieutenants," to insert "captains;" in line 8, before the word "sergeants," to insert "lieutenants;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Six telephone operators, at $600 each; janitor for police headquarters, $720; thirteen laborers, at $600 each; messenger, $700; messenger, $500; major and superintendent, mounted, $240; inspector, mounted, $240; fifty-five captains, lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted, at $240 each; sixty-four lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted, on bicycles, at $50 each; twenty-six drivers, at $600 each; and two police matrons, at $600 each, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 11, to increase the total appropriation for the salaries, etc., of the Metropolitan police of the District from $768,640 to $900,429.01.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to change the total there to $900,789.01.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the provision relating to public schools, beginning at line 26, on page 40, and ending with line 1, on page 45, be stricken from the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 26, it is proposed to strike out all after the subhead "Public schools" down to and including line 1, on page 45.

The amendment was agreed to.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has renewed his appeal to me. He has in charge a House bill which increases the salaries of the teachers of the public schools of the District of Columbia. It is very important that, if the bill is to be passed, the new schedule should be inserted in the pending appropriation bill. I therefore yield, for the present, to the Senator from Nebraska to allow him to call up the bill in which he is interested.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the amendments reported by the committee to be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The first amendment of the committee will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in section 2, page 1, line 11, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "and three of whom shall be women;" so as to read:

That the control of the public schools of the District of Columbia is hereby vested in a board of education to consist of nine members, all of whom shall have been for five years immediately preceding their appointment bona fide residents of the District of Columbia, and three of whom shall be women.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before that amendment is agreed to, I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain the reason for restricting the appointive power in this case to any certain number of one sex.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have any objection to this amendment, provided we are certain to get the right character of persons selected for this position. As I understand, the board of education under the provisions of this bill is to be appointed by the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. This is a considerable departure from anything we have had heretofore. I am not criticising the departure; I think it has been made after due and proper consideration. But my own observation and my own experience to some extent in matters of this kind do not lead me to believe that the very best interest of the schools will demand that any certain number of the board of education shall be women.

I have had considerable observation and some experience along this line. It is undoubtedly true that in such a great city as this there could be selected the proper kind of women to fill this position. It is possibly true that we could find much better material for this position if the judges were left entirely free to determine not only the personnel, but the sex of the persons to be appointed to the position. I should like to have the Senator explain the necessity of providing specifically that three of the members of this board shall be women.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think it is evident enough that the interruption of the appropriation bill, which was proceeding happily to a conclusion, will result in neither bill passing to-night. I supposed that if the school bill were taken up it would give rise to no debate. I was told that it had already been read, and that it need not be read again; but if it is going on in this way—I know the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has several amendments he wants to offer—the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will not only not get the appropriation bill through, but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] will not get his school bill through to-night.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I think there is not likely to be much discussion after this one point is passed. Whether that amendment goes in is a matter that can be determined very quickly by the Senate. The bill is only to be read for amendment, the first formal reading having been dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from North Dakota says he has several amendments to offer. But I will not oppose the consideration of the bill now, although I am very sorry we shall not be able to conclude the appropriation bill this evening.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. As I understand, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was willing that the appropriation bill should be laid aside until an effort was made to pass the school bill, because if that bill passes it will be necessary to increase the appropriation for the schools in order to take care of the additional expense which the bill in charge of the Senator from Nebraska will entail in the way of increased salaries to teachers. For that reason, I take it, the Senator from New Hampshire was willing to allow the appropriation bill to go over in order that an opportunity might be given to pass the school bill to-night.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have carefully read over the school bill. I have taken some interest in it, and there are several amendments that I wish to offer. I also wish to speak, not at any great length, but to some extent, upon each one of the amendments I intend to propose. Of course I am willing to go on to-night if the Senator desires.

Mr. BURKETT. Does the Senator make any motion with reference to this amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not made a motion yet. I simply asked the Senator to explain the necessity of governing the judgment of the judges to whom you propose to give the appointive power.

Mr. BURKETT. There is not any necessity at all for it, I will say to the Senator. The matter came up in the committee and was presented to us in the hearings. A request was made that there might be three women on the board, and the committee, on voting on the question, decided to put the provision in. That is all there is about it. If the Senate does not want it, it can strike it out. The committee by a majority vote decided to put in the provision requiring that three of the nine members of the board shall be women. That is all the explanation there is to it.

So far as the question of ability of women to serve and the desirability of their occupying such positions is concerned, there is not any use in my taking the time to argue that question, because every Senator here is just as familiar with that as I am. That is the way the amendment was put in. If the Senate does not want it, as I have said, let it be stricken out. That can be done very quickly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in section 2, page 2, line 17, before the word "appointment," to strike out "character or;" so as to read:

The organization meeting, and all meetings whatsoever thereafter, shall be open to the public, except committee meetings dealing with the appointment of teachers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 18, after the word "appointment," to strike out "however;" so as to read:

No appointment, promotion, transfer, or dismissal of any director, supervising principal, principal, head of department, teacher, or any other subordinate to the superintendent of schools, shall be made by the board of education, except upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of schools.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 4, line 4, after the word "schools," to insert:

The white assistant, under the direction of the superintendent of schools, shall have general supervision over the white schools, and is specially charged, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification, as far as may be practicable, of the educational work of the white high schools and of all academic and scientific subjects in the McKinley Manual Training School and the Business High School.

Mr. BURKETT. I move to amend the amendment on page 4, line 4, after the word "assistant," by inserting "superintendent," so as to make it read:

The white assistant superintendent, etc.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 4, after the word "assistant," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting the word "superintendent;" so that it will read:

The white assistant superintendent, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge to what I consider two or three inconsistencies, and I have an idea that probably the Senator, when his attention is called to them, will have no objection to removing them by proper amendments, unless he has some explanation to make why there should be these apparent inconsistencies in the several provisions of the bill.

The bill as it came from the House has been very materially modified, not only in the addition of new provisions, but it has been modified with reference to the system. In 1882, I think it was, we had but one important high school in the city. In 1890 there were established the Eastern, the Western, and the Business high schools. A few years later, in 1897, it was found necessary to appoint a director of high schools so that the work might be unified and the competition, which had sprung up between the several schools, might be removed. Up to that time practically each one of the high schools was independent of the other, working out its own system and having its own methods of instruction. The high school system has grown to such an extent that now there are between three and four thousand students in the high schools of the city.

As I have said, it was found necessary, in 1897, to appoint a new officer, who was known as the "director of high schools." That official position has been continued down to the present time. The name was changed in the bill as it came from the House, so that "director" was stricken out and a new designation of that official position was made. It was called, I think, "director of intermediate instruction," or something of that character. If the Senator will compare the provision on page 4 relating to the white assistant superintendent with that on the same page relating to the colored assistant superintendent, he will find that certain powers and authority are given to the colored assistant superintendent which are denied to the white assistant superintendent.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say that the word "sole" was put in the clause providing for the duties and powers of the colored assistant superintendent. Some advocated dividing the two systems—colored and white. The House, after their hearings, decided not to do it, but to keep it all under one superintendent and to give the colored assistant superintendent control of the colored schools. That was in the bill when it came from the House. So that in making this amendment prescribing the duties of the white assistant superintendent and the duties of the colored assistant superintendent the colored assistant superintendent was given that additional authority only to conform to the word "sole," which was put in in the House, giving him sole authority and control of the colored schools. That is why it was put in—to conform to the measure as it came from the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the only difference between them.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call his attention to the fact that the amendment reported by the committee has vastly improved the bill. As the bill came from the House it appointed one white assistant superintendent, but assigned no duties whatever, and I understand that this white assistant is a woman, and that up to this time it has been a sort of a sinecure, and that this amendment now gives her some duties. I think it is an improvement. As the bill came from the House it gave her the office, but no duties to perform.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there I have a serious objection to the amendment, if that is the purpose of it. I do not suppose that it is the intent of anyone on this committee to legislate a good and efficient officer out of his position. I am somewhat acquainted not only with the superintendent of schools in this city, but also with the director of high schools. I have taken a deep interest in the educational matters of the city, because I believe in educating my own children in the public schools in preference to any other school. I am desirous, like any citizen naturally would be, that we have good and efficient schools. I am desirous, as any Senator should be, that the attention and careful consideration of the Senate should be given to the matter of the conduct of the schools in the District.

Mr. BURKETT. Will the Senator let me explain the whole matter? Perhaps it will obviate the necessity of his making any further remarks. If he will yield, I will state why that was changed and all about the system. I think I can do it very quickly, if he will yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to explain one thing. The assistant superintendent, as has been suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, is a lady who has had experience in the intermediate grades. Now, if you continue the same office and provide that the same assistant superintendent, as he is spoken of, shall hold that position, then you will have as practically the director of the high schools, and one who is supposed to have charge of the entire school system of the District, one who has had only experience in grades and not one who has had any experience whatever in the high schools of the city, and you will have legislated out of office one of the very best school officers, in my opinion, that you have here in the city, and that is Mr. Hughes, director of the high schools. I get that information not only from my own casual and perhaps slight acquaintance with him, but also from all teachers of the high schools in the city. I myself do not wish to see this party by this bill legislated out of his position and another legislated into the position who has not had the requisite experience in this matter.

There is another thing that I want to call the Senator's attention to. You make this assistant superintendent practically the director of high schools and the intermediate branches. That power now is placed in the hands of one person. But when you come to the white schools, on page 13, you provide that the principal of the high school shall be subject practically to no control whatever, and the system which grew up a few years ago of practically so many independent high schools without any unification whatever of their work will be reintroduced.

Let me call the Senator's attention to page 13, I think it is:

Principals of normal, high, and manual training schools shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, together——

Mr. BURKETT. That is the place.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will commence a little lower:

All such principals—

That is, principals of high schools, manual training schools, etc.—

shall be appointed at the minimum salary, and each shall have entire control of his school, both executive and educational, subject only in authority to the superintendent of schools for the white schools and to the colored assistant superintendent for the colored schools, to whom in each case he shall be directly responsible.

In other words, while you make an assistant superintendent and give that assistant superintendent control and charge of these schools, as is indicated on page 4 of the bill, on page 13 you state in substance that the principal of the school shall have exclusive control, subject only to the restriction and restraining power of the general superintendent of all the schools. On one page, therefore, you make an assistant superintendent and on the other page you take away all of his powers. Am I not correct in that, let me ask the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator is not correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator explain to me wherein I am not correct?

Mr. BURKETT. I will explain it. That is what I was about to do when I asked the Senator to yield a few moments ago. I could have explained the whole thing, and perhaps have covered it so that the Senator would not be troubled. I can understand how, going over it hastily, he would perhaps misconstrue it. If he had spent about twelve days on it and committed it to memory backward and forward he would understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am ready to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say—I had hoped possibly it would not be necessary to take time to say anything, because it seems so important that we pass the bill quickly. In the schools here we have a superintendent. He has, say, as his right hand his white assistant superintendent. His left hand is his colored assistant superintendent. The reason for giving more power to the colored assistant superintendent is that there has been a good deal of doubting among the colored people—the colored patrons of the schools—of the school system, under the belief on their part that the white superintendents and directors were not giving them all the benefits and all the attention they ought to have. They have believed that their own people should have more direct control of their schools. They asked to have it put under the direction of the assistant superintendent of colored schools, and the House did it. In this particular we only carried out the design of the House.

Now, with respect to the school system here, every Senator who has given it as much attention as the Senator from North Dakota says he has realizes that there is a good deal of criticism from everybody and everywhere. Ever since I have been here there has been continuous controversy and prolonged conflict and investigation in the schools, and there is a very serious one going on right now. They have just closed up one that lasted over eight months. In short, there is a good deal of trouble. The people criticise the schools; the schools find fault with the people; teachers arrayed against the board, and vice versa. There has been a great deal of conflict of authority. For example, two or three persons would go to the same point with certain authority and prerogatives, and then there was a conflict, and as a result there was trouble.

Now, one of the troubles—and I will ask the Senator to stay right on page 4—was with the white assistant superintendent. He has never had any particular prescribed duty to perform. This bill, when it came from the House, prescribed specifically what the left arm should do, the colored assistant superintendent, but not one word was said about what the white assistant should do. Attached to the system between the superintendent and the assistant superintendent was the director of high schools. You could not tell just what he was responsible for or his authority, nor who he was responsible to. Yet he went through this whole system of high schools, with authority enough, authorized or assumed, that was constantly creating friction. I am not criticising him, for I understand he is a splendid man. Then there was a director of primary schools. Senators all know that the first four grades are primary, the next four intermediate, and next are the high schools. Those are the twelve grades of the complete school system.

There was a director of high schools for the top four grades, a director of the primary schools for the bottom four grades, but there was not any director for the great intermediate grades—the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grades—which are the most important part of a child's school life. Peculiarly enough, where there was no special guardian of those grades is where the greatest attack has been made upon the educational system. For example, there are 107 special teachers turned loose upon those schools, teaching cooking, millinery, manual training, music, and those special subjects. In one instance where I made an investigation 25 per cent of the child's hours in school during every week was taken up with domestic science and millinery and that sort of thing.

I may say that under the assistant superintendent there has been a corps of supervising principals; nine in the white schools, four in the colored. Under each of them there has been a certain number of principals; under the principal an assistant in some schools, and under them the teacher and then the pupils. Hence, from the superintendent to the pupil there were the teacher, the principal, the supervising principal, the assistant superintendent, and on up to the superintendent. Then across that system ran another, a lateral supervision. One was the director of the high schools. Running across the whole thing, as I have explained it heretofore, like a comet, coming from no particular place and going to no particular place, were the heads of departments—a head of the Latin department, a head of the mathematical department, a head of the scientific department. They would walk into a school and say, "This class must make an average of 95 per cent or they can not pass."

I have talked with a great many connected with the school system, with a large share of the teachers, and there are 1,400 of them. I said to a principal of a high school, "What do you do under those circumstances?" He said, "They are in control." I said, "What do you mean?" He said, "They have educational control." I said to the principal, "What are you here for?" He said, "I am here as a disciplinarian."

There has been trouble over in the McKinley Manual Training School, because there are a principal of that school and a supervising principal, and over the supervising principal there is a director of the high school, and over him an assistant superintendent, and over the assistant superintendent is a superintendent. So the committee said, "For goodness sake, let us pull up the coupling." You know if you get the hind wheels and the front wheels too far apart they wont track easily. As it is today the pupil is five or six steps from the man responsible for the school.

The recommendation of the committee will not do away with anybody's job. There are some of them that the Lord knows ought to be cut out. But we knew if we cut out a single soul who is drawing a salary in the District of Columbia he would get some kind-hearted Senator to stand up in the Senate and fight the bill. So we have not cut out one single salary. Every person who drew a salary last year will draw a larger salary this year than ever before in the school system under this bill. We first thought that these thirteen supervising principals, bossing the principals, underneath the superintendent, might be done away with. Take the white assistant superintendent. Let me say that I did not know the person; I did not know the sex; I did not know anything about it. You can not make a school bill according to personnel. You have to make it according to principle. You can not make it to suit everybody's qualifications and everybody's salary. I did not know a single teacher in these schools and never met one before I took hold of this bill except Mr. Stewart, the superintendent. Since that time I have met four or five hundred, I should judge. Until this bill was drafted and laid on the Senators' desks last week I had never met the assistant superintendent referred to. I had never met the director of the high schools. Knowing this legislation was in prospect, I did not want to go into the personnel.

The director of the high schools was hanging around in the system, without any very definite authority, without any particular specified duties to do. So we said that this assistant superintendent, who had not had any duties prescribed, should perform the duty of directing and unifying these five white high schools. We have five white high schools, or, rather, three academic high schools, a business high school, and a manual-training school. We said that the assistant superintendent shall perform the duties of assistant, but his special work shall be to supervise, not, as the Senator from North Dakota undertakes to say, that there shall be conflict of authority, but to unify the grades, to keep the several schools as nearly together as may be practicable.

That assistant works by direction of the superintendent and stands for him. There may be a teacher of grammar in the Western High School. There may be another teacher of grammar in the Eastern High School. We do not want anyone to say to this teacher or the other that "you must teach grammar according to my rule," but we want results, and we want that the principal of the Western High School, Miss Wescott, shall be responsible for the work directly to the superintendent; we want that the principal, who is there on the spot, who knows every student and his capabilities, who sees him every day, shall have the sole power and duty, subject only to the superintendent, not only as a disciplinarian, but also in educational matters.

And that is why we prescribe specifically, on page 13, that the principal of the school shall be the boss, so that one of these heads of departments may not walk in and tell a school how much grammar or how much Latin they shall have or how much mathematics they shall have, or how it shall be taught. We make the school the unit and make the principal responsible; and have over them the superintendent, working through his assistant, the high school director. That is the idea upon which the bill has been drawn all the way through. The purpose has been to centralize authority, to shorten the coupling, and bring the superintendent closer to the students. In no instance will he be farther away than two steps from the student.

Mr. SCOTT. So that there shall be somebody who is responsible.

Mr. BURKETT. So that there shall be somebody who is responsible all the while.

I want to call attention to another incident in connection with the McKinley Manual Training School. We have two manual training schools, one for white children, one for colored. At the head of each of those is an expert, the best man they can employ. They give him a good salary, running up to $2,700 in each instance. Over the principals of those schools they had a supervising principal to tell the principal how to run his school. The opinion of the committee was, that when we were paying a salary to the principal of a little high school, he should be the principal, and if he could not run it he should be put out and somebody else put in his place.

But we did not cut off the head of this supervisor. We knew there would be trouble if we did. We have twenty little shops, in which they teach manual training in the grades up to the eighth grade. There are twenty of these blacksmith shops, wagon shops, etc. We left him, but we provide that he shall have control and supervision of these twenty shops in the grades. Let the principal of the McKinley School run it; let the principal of the Armstrong Manual Training School run it, and keep the supervisor in the grades, and there will be no conflict of authority such as has occurred in the McKinley Training School. All the good of the McKinley Manual Training School this year has been wrecked by the muss that has been kicked up down there and the investigation that has been going on. The papers have been full of it. There have been scandals of all sorts. They would not have occurred if there had not been a man in charge of the school and then another man running him. We have clipped off that double authority all the way through the bill, and yet have not taken off the head of anyone, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Have you left them anything to do?

Mr. BURKETT. We have left some people who may have to hunt something to do. But the Senator has been in Washington long enough to know that when a man gets a salary in public office he always makes himself useful. I think, now, that my explanation covers perhaps all that the Senator from North Dakota requested.

Mr. NELSON. I notice that the bill provides for thirteen supervising principals.

Mr. BURKETT. It does.

Mr. NELSON. If the principals of the schools have control, are not the thirteen supervising principals supernumeries? What function is there for them to perform?

Mr. BURKETT. Let me say to the Senator that to have cut them out would have made thirteen difficulties where we now have apparently only one. There was a good deal of question about cutting off the heads of those thirteen; but after much consideration we thought, on the whole, best to leave them as they are temporarily.

Our schoolhouses are small. Almost all our schoolhouses contain only eight rooms. At our home towns we have schoolhouses with from twelve to thirty rooms, and a principal is over from twelve to thirty rooms. Here we build eight-room schoolhouses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Many of them have only four rooms.

Mr. BURKETT. Many of them have four rooms, but we do not build any schoolhouses larger than eight rooms, I think, now. The Senator is on the Committee on Appropriations, and he knows. That has been the practice here. I will tell you what the supervising principals do. They have put a principal in each one of these little schoolhouses, and then they collect a half a dozen of these eight-room schoolhouses together, and over them all they put one supervising principal. He is really the principal of each of those schools, and the nominal principal is in reality the assistant principal. They have even gone so far as to have an assistant to the assistant principal of the school. We have cut out these assistant principals of those little schools and leave the supervising principal to run five or six schools with the principal.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator do with the assistant principals?

Mr. BURKETT. We did not leave them without a job. They are all teaching school and drawing salary, and they get a little more for being an assistant. They will have their jobs, and by virtue of the fact that this bill raises the salaries, they will have their salaries raised. I will guarantee the Senator there is not a soul who loses his job by this bill. We thought we would let the matter of the thirteen supervising principals work itself out. There are 107 special teachers, and in the report it is suggested that as they go out there be no further appointments for a time. If you do not appoint any new ones to take their places as they go out gradually you will get rid of them by the natural process of elimination. So we have not cut anybody's head off.

Now, with reference to the assistant superintendent and director of high schools, we did not cut off either without a job; we left both positions, only changing their names, and provided that the assistant should be director of the high schools, and in another place that there should be a director who should have charge of the four intermediate grades. Which is which I do not know, because I do not know the qualifications. It is a matter of detail that the board can iron out when they get at it.

Mr. CARTER. Permit me to inquire of the Senator why it would not be wise to provide that when, as may sometimes occur, one of these supernumeraries resigns, or, as must inevitably occur, when they die, no one shall be appointed to fill any vacancy occurring in these supernumerary positions. Why not provide for it by law?

Mr. BURKETT. It would not offend the Senator from Nebraska, I will say to the Senator from Montana, if that sort of a provision was placed in the bill. However, the committee were very careful not to offend not only any particular teacher, but any member of the school board. We did not want to say to the superintendent of schools, "We know more about this thing than you do;" but we suggested very strongly in the report, as the Senator will see if he will read it, that if they did not attend to it, it would be in order for the Senate next year to attend to some of these matters in detail.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose this measure will not be acted on to-night.

Mr. BURKETT. We are through with all the trouble, and I think it can be finished now in a few minutes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator has by any means got started on the trouble yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from North Dakota rather suggests to the Senator from Nebraska that this matter will not be disposed of to-night.

Mr. McCUMBER. Evidently not.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he can not by the time the Senate meets to-morrow make a list of the absolutely useless officials to whom he has referred and who are now upon the pay rolls here?

Mr. BURKETT. I would not want to say that any of them were useless. They all perform some function. But I think the school board should work this out.

If there is anything special that is troubling the Senator from North Dakota that I have not touched on and that the Senator wants to know about, I will be glad to have him ask a question, and I will go right at it specially.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will give me his attention one moment, I wish to explain just one provision to the Senator that the Senator has absolutely failed to explain, and as long as the English language has meaning the Senator will be unable wholly to explain it away. That is the inconsistency between the two provisions which I pointed out in the first instance.

I wish to say to the Senator that I agree with him that this bill is a vast improvement over the educational law as it has stood upon the statute books. That is not saying, however, that it has reached the climax of perfection by any means. There are still errors in the bill, there are still inconsistencies in it, and there are still some things in it that I can not understand.

For instance, I understand in some instances the right bower has more force than the left bower in certain kind of games, but I do not understand why in this school law the left bower, that the Senator has designated as the assistant superintendent of the colored schools, should have given to him authority that is directly taken away by the bill from the white superintendent.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that there is none; that there is——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator not to confuse terms. Here is the power that is given to the superintendent of the white school:

The white assistant—

Superintendent, of course, is understood—

under the direction of the superintendent of schools, shall have general supervision over the white schools, and is specifically charged, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification, as far as may be practicable, of the educational work of the white high schools.

Now, the same follows in reference to the colored superintendent, with this addition:

And he also shall be charged specifically, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification of the educational work of the intermediary grades of the colored schools.

Mr. BURKETT. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, the white superintendent is not charged with the unification of the graded schools and the colored superintendent is charged with the unification of the colored graded schools.

Mr. BURKETT. I did not explain that. I will state that there are just one-fourth as many pupils in the colored high school as there are white pupils in the white schools, and we thought as there are only one-fourth as many pupils that the colored assistant superintendent could take care of both the high school and the intermediary, and that as there are four times as many white pupils you have two people to take care of those.

Mr. McCUMBER. We are trying to unify this school system, and we are trying under this system to have the same systematic work in all the schools. We should have a unification of the system in the grades in the white schools. We want somebody who is charged with the unification of those grades, and he should be the assistant superintendent of the white schools the same as the assistant superintendent of the colored schools. There is just one other matter——

Mr. BURKETT. Does the Senator understand that there are only one-fourth as many colored pupils as there are white pupils?

Mr. McCUMBER. Though there may not be one-tenth, the system should be exactly the same, and the power of the officers should be exactly the same.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to call attention to just one other point where there is inconsistency, and then, I think, we have done all we need to do this evening. On page 4 it is provided that—

The white assistant, under the direction of the superintendent of schools, shall have general supervision over the white schools.

That has meaning. It means that he shall have general supervision over the white schools.

Now, turn to page 13, and it says:

Not the assistant superintendent—

All such principals shall be appointed at the minimum salary, and each shall have entire control of his school——

Mr. BURKETT. Subject only to the authority of the superintendent.

Mr. McCUMBER. "Both executive and educational." How can you say that those two are consistent, that the assistant superintendent shall have charge of the entire system of the schools and then provide in another section that each one of the principals of the schools shall have—entire control of his school, both executive and educational, subject only in authority to the—

Not to the assistant superintendent, but—in authority to the superintendent of all the schools.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President, I will take this up further to-morrow, and I hope the Senator will not be too persistent about objecting to any amendment that is intended to make this measure harmonious.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. I will say in reply——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say in reply——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BURKETT. I beg pardon.

[Mr. LONG submitted a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which appears under the heading "Reports of committees."]

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to make a report, which I send to the desk.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not in order. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor, and under the rule recently adopted it is not in order to interrupt a Senator on the floor with routine business.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that a report has just been submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas submitted it, having the floor in his own right.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well; I withdraw the report for the present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rose to make an observation and then to move an executive session.

I want to say, in reference first to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, that I shall seek an early opportunity to-morrow to have the Senate resume consideration of that bill, and I trust that we may be able to complete it.

I wish to say in reference to the school bill, Mr. President, that the Committee on the District of Columbia, as the Senate knows, has had a deluge of bills before it, some of them very troublesome ones. The chairman of that committee feels that he was very fortunate in the appointment of a subcommittee, of which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] was chairman, who were willing to take up this very troublesome question and give days and weeks to its consideration. I felicitate the Senator from Nebraska on framing what I think is a most excellent school bill, and I trust that while it shall be debated and amendments offered, it will not be unduly obstructed, because it is very important that it should pass at an early day if the teachers are to receive the benefit of the increased salaries provided in that bill.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me to submit a report from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I do not quite know what to do when Senators appeal to me. I think I will withhold my motion for an executive session, and take my seat, and then Senators can transact routine business.

COMPAÑÍA DE LOS FERROCARRILES DE PUERTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a very short bill. It will take but a few minutes. It is the bill (S. 5684) for the relief of the Compañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims (notwithstanding any statutory bar of limitations) over the claims of the Compañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico, with power to find the facts and to enter judgment against the United States for the reasonable value of the services performed by that company in the island of Porto Rico for transporting the municipal police and guardia civille between the 12th day of August, 1898, and the 31st day of August, 1902, and for the difference between the amount allowed for transporting the troops, munitions of war, supplies, and the like, and the reasonable value of said services for the same period, together with the expense of repair and maintenance of telegraph lines of the Signal Corps, all of said services having been performed during the military occupation of that island.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 9, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 8, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TO PROHIBIT ALIENS FISHING IN ALASKAN WATERS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the Alaskan fishery bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the following conference report. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

A bill (S. 267) to prohibit aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, has this bill passed the House?

Mr. POWERS. The bill passed the Senate, came to the House, and we struck the entire Senate bill out and inserted one of our own. We passed the Senate bill with that amendment; it went over to the Senate, and the conferees on the part of the Senate determined that our bill was a much better one than theirs, and consented to it with a slight amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has this bill ever passed the House?

Mr. POWERS. It passed the House. This is a conference report, and the Senate has agreed to our views of the bill. It passed the House about a month ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it could not, because the gentleman from Ohio was speaking to me only the other day about passing the bill, and the gentleman from Florida was speaking to me about it, and they were at that time wanting to get it through under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. POWERS. I do not think either of those gentlemen ever had anything to do with this bill. That is another and different bill.

The SPEAKER. It passed the House on the 16th day of April.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That is another bill that the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the subject-matter of this bill?

Mr. POWERS. It prohibits ships of aliens from fishing in our fisheries and carrying away our fish all along the Alaska coast within the 3-mile limit.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON PART OF THE HOUSE.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 267) to prohibit aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the conference report, namely:

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agrees to the same with certain verbal amendments set forth in the conference report. The effect of these verbal amendments is merely to make clearer the meaning of the bill. The effect of the bill is changed in no way.

LLEWELLYN POWERS,
EDWIN W. HIGGINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be well to state the necessity for the passage of this bill. The Japanese are coming to our waters, catching ship loads of salmon, and carrying them back to their own country for canning purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the gentleman to say that this covers the case of foreign ships coming into our waters, fishing, and carrying away cargoes of our fish to foreign countries.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

SPURIOUSLY STAMPED GOLD AND SILVER ARTICLES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 14604) forbidding the importation, exportation, or carriage in interstate commerce of falsely or spuriously stamped articles of merchandise made of gold or silver or their alloys, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANK M. DOOLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 15692) granting a pension to Frank M. Dooley, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. CARROLL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 13828) granting an increase of pension to John M. Carroll, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

STEPHEN CUNDIFF.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10395) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Cundiff, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB SCHAFER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3005) granting an increase of pension to Jacob C. Schafer, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES B. ADAMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 16878) granting an increase of pension to James C. Adams, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

GREENE EVANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18116) granting an increase of pension to Greene Evans, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

BENEDICT SUTTER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18135) granting an increase of pension to Benedict Sutter, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

JONATHAN SKEANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18561) granting an increase of pension to Jonathan Skeans, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION BUSINESS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar, which are in order under the rule to-day, may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar, which are in order to-day, may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand this request relates to pension bills?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HENRY G. THOMAS, DECEASED.

The first pension business was the bill (S. 2624) granting an honorable discharge to Henry G. Thomas, deceased, Company C, Second Kentucky Cavalry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of, and grant an honorable discharge to, Henry G. Thomas, deceased, late captain of Company C, Second Kentucky Cavalry: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ELLA N. HARVEY.

The next pension business was the bill (S. 6) granting an increase of pension to Ella N. Harvey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ella N. Harvey, widow of Ira B. Harvey, late of Company D, First Regiment District of Columbia Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD HIGGINS.

The next pension business was the bill (S. 20) granting an increase of pension to Edward Higgins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward Higgins, late of Company L, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ELIAS PHELPS.

The next pension business was the bill (S. 215) granting an increase of pension to Elias Phelps.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JULIUS A. DAVIS.

The next pension business was the bill (S. 911) granting an increase of pension to Julius A. Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julius A. Davis, late of Company A, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I will not take up much of the valuable time of the House, but I desire to call the attention of the country and also the old Mexican soldiers to the reason why they have not had their pensions increased to $30 per month. When I first came to this body as one of its Members, I introduced a bill to increase the pensions of all Mexican soldiers that served their country honorably and well during our struggle with Mexico who from age, accident, or disease were unable to perform manual labor, who were without an income sufficient to maintain themselves, from $12 to $30 per month. I diligently strove during the Fifty-eighth Congress to get a hearing upon that measure, which was pending before the Committee on Pensions. But, sir, for some reason the chairman of the committee, who is also chairman of the subcommittee in charge of general pension bills, declined to give me a hearing upon it.

I then felt, sir, that when I came back to the House as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress that perhaps, if I could get the Speaker to appoint me a member of the Committee on Pensions, I might have a better opportunity of importuning the chairman of the subcommittee to at least give me a hearing upon the subject; so I urged that I be given an assignment to that committee, and the powers that be were kind enough to heed my request. But, sir, the reason that appeared to me strange in the Fifty-eighth Congress has followed from that time until now, and I have been unable to get a hearing upon that bill, although I have frequently importuned the chairman of the subcommittee to give me a hearing.

Sir, I can not understand who can possibly oppose a measure that seeks to give to the grand old Mexican soldiers a pension of $30 a month—a dollar a day—after they had reached the age of 75 years and are impoverished in purse.

Sir, these old men have been clamoring for and importuning every Member of this body to give their support to this bill, and I am free to say that, in my humble judgment, were the measure reported to the House by the Pension Committee there are not ten of its entire membership that would cast their votes in the negative.

No, sir; I do not believe there are five Members of the House who are not willing to give these old veterans a dollar a day in their declining years to sustain them as they totter slowly, but patiently, to the grave. Sir, there are less than 4,000 of these old patriots living at this hour, and they are rapidly passing away, and their average age is 87 years. Think, Mr. Speaker, of our refusing to heed their appeals and give them this small pittance, when we know that it will only be a few days, a few weeks, a few months, at most, when they will be called upon to cross over the dark river of death and answer to the roll call upon the other side. [Applause.]

Sir, since I have been here I have had the good fortune to see some of their pensions increased by special bill from $12 to $20. The Senate has been good enough during the present session of Congress to pass a bill increasing their pensions to $20 a month. That bill has been in the hands of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Pensions for a number of weeks, and yet no report upon it has been presented to this House.

Sir, I here and now ask this body to interest itself in behalf of these old patriots; to do something for them in their declining years; to speak to the chairman of the committee and see if they can not aid me in my humble effort to get him to give them "a day in court," which would mean nothing less than a favorable report. [Applause.]

EDWIN MORGAN.

The next pension business was the bill (S. 1174) granting an increase of pension to Edwin Morgan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edwin Morgan, late of Company F, Fifth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. BOWLES.

The next pension business was the bill (S. 1224) granting an increase of pension to William A. Bowles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William A. Bowles, late of Company B, Thirty-second Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

FREEMAN V. WALKER.

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14928) for the relief of F. V. Walker, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint F. V. Walker, late captain and assistant surgeon, United States Army, an assistant surgeon with the same relative grade he had at the time of his retirement, and to place him upon the retired list of the Army.

With the following amendments:

That the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order Freeman V. Walker, late captain and assistant surgeon, United States Army, again before a retiring board for the purpose of a new hearing of his case and to inquire into and determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of his disability, and to find and report the cause which, in its judgment, has produced his incapacity, and whether such cause is an incident of the service, according to the statute, and that upon the findings of such board the President is further authorized, in his discretion, either to confirm the order by which the said Freeman V. Walker was wholly retired, or, in his discretion, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said Freeman V. Walker an assistant surgeon with the same relative grade which he had at the time of his retirement, and to place him upon the retired list of the Army: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance during the period between the time that he was heretofore retired and the time of the passage of this act shall become due and payable by virtue of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has just reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LESTER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JESSE ELLIOTT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is one bill which was omitted from the Calendar this afternoon by error, and which will now be considered.

A bill (H. R. 5504) for the relief of Jesse Elliott.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the records of the War Department in such manner as to show that Jessee Elliot, a private, Company G, Fifth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Volunteer Infantry, was enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States on the 18th day of January, 1865, and was killed while in service by the enemy in line of duty April 28, 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PREVENTION OF COLLISIONS ON INLAND WATERS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave to file herewith the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 17564) to amend an act entitled "An act to adopt regulations preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may file views of the minority upon the bill indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY AT SUPERIOR, WIS.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented the bill (H. R. 19519) to establish a subport of entry at Superior, Wis., with the privilege of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, there was pending when the committee rose last evening an amendment to the last paragraph read, the amendment being to strike out, on line 20, page 24, the word "fractional." I do not desire at this time to say anything more, but before we close debate on this subject I may want to say something further. I understand there are two or three other gentlemen who desire to be heard on the question. The question involved is as to whether we shall continue to do what we have been doing in the past years, to wit, provide for the free transportation of silver dollars to parties desiring them. I am willing to yield the floor for the present, but I desire to state only what the pending question was.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is the same amendment which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] offered at the beginning of this session of Congress during the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. Prior to that time and for a number of years the sundry civil appropriation bill has carried an appropriation of $120,000 to defray the expense of the transportation of silver dollars from the Treasury and the subtreasuries of the United States to the banks and to the department stores and to anybody else who might want to use silver dollars as a medium of exchange or as a medium of advertising. The appropriation for the current fiscal year was not sufficient to meet that expenditure, and at the beginning of this session the Secretary of the Treasury submitted to Congress a deficiency estimate of $10,000 for the purpose of continuing that service throughout the year. There is no law authorizing the free transportation of silver dollars. The only authority existing to-day for that service is the appropriation of money and the authorization of its expenditure for this particular purpose.

The Committee on Appropriations declined to allow the estimate, and that conclusion was reached after the most careful investigation and after hearing the departmental officials in charge of the administration of this appropriation. That conclusion was based upon the fact that the silver dollar is the only form of money, except fractional silver coin and minor coins, nickels and pennies, that the Government transports free to anybody, and in the judgment of the committee we thought it was time to put a stop to this contribution to the banks of the United States and to the department stores that were availing themselves of this free distribution of silver dollars and using them as advertisements by giving out fractional currency and new silver dollars for the purpose of advertising their business. There was a further consideration. It was brought out before the committee that the express companies, who are the chief beneficiaries, were abusing the privilege which this appropriation afforded by taking silver dollars and transporting them to their destination by the most circuitous route that they could possibly find in order that their revenue from that source might be greater.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not possible for the Department to send that silver out by registered mail or otherwise instead of allowing express companies to take advantage of the Government in that way?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, it is; and I would say to the gentleman from South Carolina that that is the language of the law to-day, that has been the language of the law, and the law reads, "for the transportation of silver coin by registered mail or otherwise," but up to this time not a silver dollar has been transported by registered mail. All has been sent by the United States Express Company and its connecting companies.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if this abuse, having been brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury, they will not hereafter send them by mail?

Mr. TAWNEY. That matter, Mr. Chairman, so far as fractional silver coin is concerned and minor coin is concerned, we seek to remedy in this bill by requiring the transportation of coin or Government securities, which include national-bank and Federal currency, by registered mail.

Mr. SMYSER. Can not the authorities in charge utilize the mails instead of the express for the shipment of this coin?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. POWERS. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. POWERS. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if the Government has not a contract with all the express companies stating exactly what they shall pay for carrying all moneys between certain points?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has with the United States Express Company only.

Mr. POWERS. Then what matters it whether they go by a more circuitous or a straight route from one point to another?

Mr. TAWNEY. Ah, but that contract is based upon the number of miles that the money is carried. I cited in this debate at the beginning of this session of Congress an illustration of the abuse of the privilege which the express companies enjoyed under this appropriation; a bank in Yonkers, N. Y., 17 miles from the city hall in the city of New York, asked for or called upon the subtreasury for a certain number of silver dollars, the exact number I do not now remember. That shipment was made via the United States Express Company to a point up in the State of New York, 250 miles. It was there transshipped or delivered to another express company and shipped to a place, I think, called Tarrytown, 250 miles farther, but back in the direction of Yonkers, and was then shipped from there to Yonkers, a distance, if my memory serves me right, of some 20 or 30 miles. Instead of being shipped direct from the subtreasury to the bank in Yonkers, it was shipped in this circuitous route of almost 500 miles, and each one of those three different express companies got a fee or received compensation for that service under the contract with the Government of the United States.

Mr. POWERS. You say it is by the mile?

Mr. TAWNEY. By the mile.

Mr. POWERS. How long has this gone on?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to say how long this has been going on.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. TAWNEY. The discovery was made at the beginning of this session of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, I want to say one thing further, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee just in a minute. At the beginning of this session of Congress, when the Committee on Appropriations reported the urgent deficiency bill omitting this deficiency item, the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, offered the same amendment that he has offered now, in substance the same amendment, for the accomplishment of identically the same purpose; and, after full debate on that question, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union voted down the amendment by an overwhelming majority. Now, I want to say——

Mr. KEIFER. I wish the gentleman would allow me to correct him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman refuse to yield to me?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, you have spoken of this oppressive action of the express companies, which is absolutely true, as I have investigated the matter; but you are evading the fact that if it be sent by mail we can avoid this abuse and this great expense.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is not in the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have said that we can carry silver coin through the mail.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have reported a provision by which the Government, in the event it is passed, will not have to pay the expense, which we maintain we are not obliged to pay, because there is no justification for it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did not the gentleman say a moment ago that you could send silver coin by mail—send a silver dollar, silver coin? And we can make this appropriation and send it by mail, and avoid the oppressive prices the express companies have been charging, and they are outrageous.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the provision which the committee has now reported to the House, if adopted, would provide free transportation through the mail of fractional silver coin, which we think the Government can afford to do and ought to do; and also for the free transportation of minor coins—nickles and pennies. But above the fractional currency and minor coins there is absolutely no justification or excuse for it. There would be no more justification for the free transportation of silver dollars than there is for the free transportation of one-dollar silver certificates, or any other kind of currency of any other denomination. We do not pay for the transportation of currency. We do not bear that expense. Why should we provide for the free transportation of silver dollars when we know that the free transportation is not in the interest of the circulation of the silver dollar; that in many instances it is for the purpose of advancing the business interests of private concerns, who play upon the imagination of people by giving out a nice bright silver dollar in change in their department stores?

Mr. PADGETT. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I want, before I yield, to call attention to the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee on this subject. He says [reading]:

We have been using about $40,000——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Shaw says:

We have been using about $40,000 to send the fractional currency out. That, I am of the opinion, ought to be continued.

The CHAIRMAN. That is continued under the last urgent deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. SHAW. Yes, sir. We have been using about $40,000. If it is not $50,000, it ought to be $50,000. I do not see the occasion for the Government to pay the transportation of silver any more. The reasons that existed for that previously do not exist now.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you the reasons?

Mr. SHAW. The policy then was to send out all the silver we could. We were buying large quantities of silver and coining it; that is, we were sending out all the silver that the country would absorb, and we did everything we could to get it into circulation; but we have quit buying silver and quit coining it, and most of the silver is out that is not covered by silver certificates, and there is no reason why we should ship silver free that does not apply to the shipping of any other kind of money.

The CHAIRMAN. If the appropriation is made for the transportation of fractional currency, will you continue your present contract with the United States Express Company for that purpose?

Mr. SHAW. I know of no reason why we should not. I do not know how long the contract runs.

Since then, Mr. Chairman, I will say that the committee has ascertained that it is a yearly contract, and that the present contract expires at the expiration of the present fiscal year. I am reading from page 190 of the hearings. Then, this question arose as to the transportation of money by registered mail as such by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the reason which originally justified the sending out such money no longer existed now; it is supported only by the desire on the part of some people, who want it for use in their department stores, to get something out of the Government for nothing. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman has gotten considerably off the point that I wanted to inquire about. With reference to the shipment mentioned from New York to Yonkers, a distance of 17 miles, I believe that you stated that the shipment was circuitously made a distance of 500 miles. I will ask you if that does not show very great, even culpable, inefficiency of the administrative officers that permitted such a thing as that, when they know that New York and Yonkers are only 17 miles apart, to pay expressage for 500 miles?

Mr. TAWNEY. The explanation of that transaction is the fact that when they are entering into a contract involving the transportation of money from one subtreasury or another subtreasury to any part of the United States that it is absolutely impossible to make a contract, an inflexible contract, that would meet the situations and conditions that prevail in different parts of the country; and it is because of that fact that a contract can not be drawn so as to avoid certain abuses of that kind if the express company sees fit to avail itself of the conditions.

Mr. PADGETT, Mr. DIXON of Montana, and Mr. POWERS rose.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Could not a contract be made at so much a mile for the distance actually traveled in the shipment? Could not a simple contract of that kind be made?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will read the hearings, I think he will find that is the kind of contract we have now.

Mr. PADGETT. I have not finished my question to the gentleman.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. What argument is there in favor of the free transportation of fractional silver coin, at the expense of the Government, that does not apply equally to the free transportation of silver dollars?

Mr. TAWNEY. The fractional silver coin is the coin that is used in making change. There is a necessity for that. There is no currency that takes the place of fractional silver coin, but there is a currency that takes the place of the silver dollar; and for that reason the committee felt justified in agreeing to the conference on one of the urgent deficiency bills, earlier in this session of Congress, and in consenting to the Senate amendment adding the free transportation of fractional silver coin, because it was a necessity for the prosecution of the public business.

Mr. PADGETT. I have not finished my question to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. PADGETT. I was not entirely satisfied with the explanation given by the gentleman with reference to that contract. Can not a contract specify that it shall be over the direct route, for the distance usually traveled in going from one point to the other?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, I do not know. I suppose it could; but there are different express companies through whose hands the silver would have to be transported in order to reach its destination.

Mr. PADGETT. Does the gentleman think that any efficient administration would pay express charges on a distance of 500 miles when there is a route 17 miles long between the two places?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to attempt to construe the existing contract. I have never seen it. Nor do I intend to criticise the contract, or criticise the Department that entered into the contract. I have simply stated facts, and it is up to this House now to say whether we shall continue the free transportation of silver dollars, or put the silver dollar with respect to transportation upon the same basis with all other money except money below the denomination of a dollar.

Mr. PADGETT. But the gentleman was offering that as a reason why we should not ship by express, and I was only meeting the specific case which the gentleman urged.

Mr. POWERS, Mr. BURGESS, and Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government now has contracts with all these express companies?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; with only one.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. When was that contract made?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a yearly contract and can not be made for more than a year, because the appropriation is made every year.

Mr. KEIFER. It is an annual contract.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no authority in law for this contract, except that which is based upon the appropriation itself.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Does not that contract provide that it may be abrogated on six months' notice by either party?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know whether it can be abrogated on six months' notice, or on thirty days' notice.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Does not that contract provide that that express company shall carry all the money and securities of the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. It does.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And this provision is practically an abrogation of that contract.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not, because this relates to the next fiscal year, for which there is no contract.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. If no contract is made, does this appropriation bill make provision for the security of the transportation of the vast sums of money that are contemplated to be sent by mail?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; by leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury to avail himself of the same facilities for securing that money that the banks of the United States are to-day availing themselves of for the security of the money which they are transporting.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I insist that that protection is not adequate.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why is it not?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Simply because the railway mail service of the United States is in no manner equal to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman knows that the banks avail themselves of the indemnity insurance companies, and the evidence before the committee is that the Government can insure every dollar of the money that is transported by registered mail and then save $91,000 a year on the transportation of the money and the silver coin.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. At what rate could they insure it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not recall the rate.

Mr. BURLESON. They can insure the full value, of course.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman specify the law that gives the Government authority to insure the funds that would be sent by registered mail?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I can not give it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any such law?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know whether there is or not. I am informed by the man in charge of the transportation of money that they can avail themselves of that privilege.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe that you can find any law on the statute books which would authorize the Government to insure the funds.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Will not this drive out the silver dollar as a medium of circulation?

Mr. TAWNEY. There has not been a silver dollar shipped free in the last six months, and there has been no curtailment or falling off in the circulation of silver dollars.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I have letters from several bankers in my State saying that the effect of wiping out of this appropriation will absolutely drive the silver dollar out of circulation, which in my country is used in making change, and not in the place of the silver certificates of the East.

Mr. TAWNEY. I had one letter of that kind from a banker in my district, and I wrote to him explaining the reason why the committee and the House did not approve of the continuance of the free transportation of silver dollars, and he wrote back and said that he thought Congress was justified in putting a stop to it under the circumstances.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman from Minnesota will allow me, is it not a fact that if what has heretofore been the law is eliminated from this appropriation bill the sections of our country which have no subtreasuries will be placed at a disadvantage as compared with sections of our country which have subtreasuries? Is not that a fact?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Texas that they will not be at any more disadvantage than they are now in respect to all other forms of money that the Government issues.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman is begging the question.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, this provision permitting silver dollars to be shipped to various parts of our country for the purpose of accommodating the people who desire to have them, and for the purpose of putting silver into circulation, has been a part of the policy of this Government for a great many years. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says you might as well ship $1 bills. Why, there are not $1 bills enough or anywhere near enough to accommodate the demands of the people of the country. No Member of this House knows that fact better than the distinguished banker and Member from Connecticut. All through the South and through a great portion of the West, especially beyond the Mississippi River, the silver dollar is used almost universally, and the $1 bill is hardly ever seen. Now, the very fact that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] states that certain firms can get trade by advertising that they will pay out new silver dollars proves that the people want this currency; they want the new dollar and not the old one. The Government, through its seigniorage, makes nearly 50 cents in coining every one of these silver dollars. By putting them in circulation many of them will necessarily be lost or destroyed or worn, so that they will be redeemed as bullion; so that in the end the Government is largely the gainer by aiding the distribution of silver dollars throughout the country. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that we should continue this policy, that we should permit the banks in the different parts of the country to have the silver dollar with which to accommodate their customers and supply a popular demand.

Now, I want to say one word in reference to this alleged swindling by an express company. First, I will assert that it seems strange, indeed, that the express company with which the Government makes its contract should ever stoop to any such swindling as that which the gentleman from Minnesota has referred to—namely, send a package of silver dollars several hundred miles to get it from New York to Yonkers, in order to draw more mileage pay. I do not deny the statement of the gentleman, but think there must have been some strange conditions to have caused it, and it seems that no one who might know has been called upon to explain it.

Mr. MADDEN. The testimony shows that.

Mr. POWERS. Second, if any express company has ever done what is alleged, then the Auditor of the Treasury, in my judgment, is guilty of culpable negligence if he approves the bill and pays it. [Applause.]

Third, in making the annual contract with the express companies it requires but a word to state, if you pay by the mile—I confess frankly although I have shipped a good deal of Government money, and I didn't know it was paid for by the mile—it requires only a word to state in that contract that it must be by the nearest practicable route, and then there can be nothing of this kind done.

These silver dollars are a species of currency that a great portion of our people want and use. Silver is a product of our country, and while I have always stood by the gold standard and believe that that is the correct measure of value and the only one, I believe also that what legislation we have that tends to give this product of our country a circulation and a use, at the same time supplying to our people what they want, should be continued. The people can get it through this Government contract and can get it in no other way, I should say, as satisfactorily or cheaply. I am confident that what has been done for so many years past emphasizes a sound and correct policy, and I believe that policy should be continued by the Congress, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause.]

I would call attention to the fact that in continuing this policy the gentleman from Ohio does not increase the appropriation. I think it ought to be increased. I should cheerfully vote for a larger sum, but whether it is increased or not, I believe this policy of free Government transportation of silver to all parts of the country, which we have had so many years and with which the people are satisfied and desire continued quite as much as the country banks, is right and proper and good legislation, and that the usual appropriation for this purpose will commend itself to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, there is no silver question embodied in this proposition in any way, shape, or manner. All the talk about 50 cents profit of coinage may well be dismissed. The coinage of silver dollars has ceased, probably never to be renewed. The policy which the committee now propose to change ought to end with the discontinuance of the coinage of the dollar. It was begun many years ago with a good motive and a good purpose, to try to bring the silver dollar into circulation. It has been a complete and total failure. There has been no increase in the circulation by reason of free transportation.

As long ago as 1893 the matter was carefully investigated and very thoroughly considered, and the whole subject was reviewed by the Secretary of the Treasury. He stated emphatically that his opinion was—and, by the way, it has been concurred in by every Secretary of the Treasury since—that the free transportation of the silver dollar tended to reduce the circulation rather than to increase it, strange as it may seem.

Let me show you how that will be. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] smiles. Perhaps if he will read the statements of those familiar with the subject connected with the Treasury Department, he would smile in a different way.

Mr. KEIFER. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I will ask the gentleman why it is that it has decreased since the limitation was put upon the amount that could be expended—$2,000,000 a year—within the last six weeks?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know what may have occurred within the last six weeks, and I do not know as that had any particular effect upon it. I take the statistics of the circulation of the silver dollars during the last twenty years, and while it has slightly increased in the aggregate, it has decreased per capita—that is, in proportion to the population of the United States. That is the only way in which to figure it.

Let me cite, for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], a single case that has occurred in his own State. I refer to the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] yesterday, that the free transportation of silver was needed for the people of his State for use in handling their crops. A bank president from the State of Texas told me a short time ago that they had accumulated in their vaults 250,000 silver dollars, and that they were doing the best they could to get them out of there and change them into usable money, for silver is not desirable in any such quantity, and their object and purpose was to get it back to the mint at New Orleans. How did they do it? They could not pay it out except to the railroad companies, and they worked it along gradually through their pay rolls until it got to New Orleans. Why did the accumulation come? Simply because the country bankers all over Texas, desiring to increase their reserve accounts and wishing to get rid of the money of the least use to them, forwarded the silver dollars and made a practice of doing it.

Why did the banks transfer this silver instead of the paper or gold? Because any time they saw fit, all they had to do was write to the subtreasury at New Orleans and have silver sent back at the Government expense, but gold or paper would only be transmitted back at their own cost. Mr. Carlisle and every Secretary of the Treasury since has said that if they did not have the opportunity to have it retransmitted at Government expense, they would hold it in the banks, as the banks ought to do, to maintain the circulation in their own communities.

It is the easy method of getting it which induces the banks to draw it out of circulation, and that is the process that is constantly going on. I will put in the RECORD again—I have put it in there several times—the statement of ex-Secretary J. G. Carlisle describing this whole process. It is in a letter from John G. Carlisle to Senator Voorhees in 1893, in which he says that the effect is to decrease the circulation of silver:

> The greater part of the cost to the Government of the issue and distribution of silver coins is for their transportation under the provisions of the appropriation laws above referred to. Such an expenditure is unexampled in other countries, as I am informed, and is of so recent origin and doubtful results in this that it should, in my opinion, be discontinued.
> The practice with regard to the payment of charges for transportation on other moneys of the United States sent to or from the Treasury varied much until June 30, 1883, but since that time this expense has uniformly been imposed upon the private sender and consignee. The exception made in favor of the silver coins has cost the Treasury heavily, without producing any corresponding advantage either to the Treasury or to the public.
> The circulation of the kinds of money which is supplied to the people and received from them at their own expense for transportation has steadily increased, but there has been no material gain for years in the number of silver dollars in circulation and only a natural one in the amount of subsidiary silver coin. The discrimination in favor of silver has opened the way to abuses, which are of more or less common knowledge. Coin has been called for, not because it was really needed for circulation, but because it could be obtained without expense. These excessive issues are soon returned to the Treasury, together with considerable other sums which would be retained by the holders if it were not so easy to obtain fresh supplies. If, then, these considerations are sound, the cost of the issue and redemption of silver coin is increased by the payment of the charges for transportation in three ways:
> 1. By the assumption of a charge which properly should be borne by the public.
> 2. By the increase of this charge and of the expense of handling arising from the issue of coin not required for circulation.
> 3. By a like increase arising from a freer return to the Treasury than there otherwise would be of coin required for circulation.
> In my judgment, therefore, it would be in the line of economy and sound public policy to retain the act of June 9, 1879, in its entirety upon the statute book, and to discontinue the appropriations for the free distribution of standard silver dollars and subsidiary silver coins.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why does the gentleman favor the transmission through the mail or by express of fractional coin and object to the transmission of the silver dollar?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, as a matter of principle, I would not favor either; but I will tell the gentleman why it is done, in my judgment. The subsidiary coin is not a legal tender and therefore can not be used in the large amounts in which the legal-tender silver dollar is used, and consequently the privilege is not abused, and the subsidiary coin does, as a matter of fact, remain in circulation and is constantly increasing in circulation, whereas the very opposite is true in regard to the standard silver dollar; so that the statistics will justify, better than any argument I could make, having different policies with the different coins.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that down South and out West and in a great many sections of the country they use the silver dollar and the silver certificate and fractional silver? Does he not know, also, the fractional coin is tender for sums not exceeding $10 in any one payment?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where they use the fractional silver they also use the silver dollar.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, Mr. Chairman, it having been absolutely proven that the free transmission of legal-tender silver dollars does tend to reduce the circulation rather than to increase it——

Mr. KEIFER. To whom has that been proven?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, to the Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Let us take up the other side of the subject. Is the law abused? The gentleman said something a moment ago about canceling contracts with the express companies. Why, gentlemen, the Treasury Department is absolutely helpless. The law says it shall be transmitted free. The matter which has been referred to by the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], of the transportation of silver from New York to Yonkers is trivial. I put in the RECORD six or seven years ago one case where an express company in this country obtained $16,000 from the Treasury of the United States for carrying its own money from San Francisco to New York.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But we propose to take that away from the express companies and let the Government manage it through the mail.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But it costs, just the same. You have to pay the railway companies for carrying the mail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, of course; but in taking it through the mail it will cost a great deal less.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Let me show you how this law can be abused, and the practice carried on legally without robbing anybody except the Treasury of the United States. I will cite an actual occurrence. A bank in Delaware desiring to pay another bank 20 miles away, instead of sending the draft on New York, which happened at the time to be at a small discount, to the bank 20 miles away, and knowing that the bank 20 miles away would charge up the difference in the exchange, simply sent its draft to New York and instructed its correspondent in New York to have the silver dollars shipped from New York down to Delaware at the expense of the Government. That is an actual case, and that is going on all over the United States under the law because the law is broad enough to permit it.

A man at Port Townsend, Wash., desired to pay duties to the United States. Port Townsend is not a large place, but a great many vessels come in there and a great deal of legal-tender money is required, as it takes legal tender to pay duties. What does he do? He sends his draft to San Francisco and orders the silver dollars sent up to Port Townsend at an expense to the Government of $4 a thousand. They go to Port Townsend, and the bags with the Government seal on them—I am not citing an imaginary case, but an actual one—the bags of silver dollars with the Government seals on them are used to pay the duty on this shipment of goods. Who does it go to? To the collector of customs. What does he do? Under the law he is obliged to retransmit that identical money to the subtreasury in San Francisco. Under the provisions of this law the Government has paid $7.50 a thousand to carry silver dollars from San Francisco to Port Townsend and back to San Francisco, without the seals on the bags having been broken or the bags having been opened, and having performed only this one small service. What does the Treasury Department say in regard to the matter? Understand, the coinage of silver dollars has stopped. There is no possible way to increase it without further legislation. Consequently, you have no excuse then for continuing this practice in order to get them into circulation. This is what the Treasurer of the United States said this year:

> For the past two or three years the accumulation of silver dollars in the Treasury has not been in excess of the amount that could have been disposed of in the regular transactions of the Treasury offices, and it is submitted that under these conditions it will be an unnecessary burden upon the Government to continue the shipment of silver dollars free of expense for transportation charges to depositors therefor. The amount in circulation June 30, 1905, was $73,584,336, and from the changes observed in the past six years it is estimated that the maximum of circulation has been reached. The annual movement of these dollars under present regulations entails great expense not only for the transportation but for labor in counting, bagging, handling, and storing; by constant and repeated movement the "wear and tear" is producing a result that will ultimately require an additional expense to make good the loss by abrasion. The ease—

And I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the statement of the Treasurer of the United States in accord with the statement which I made—

> The ease with which this coin can be obtained from the Treasury without expense for transportation charges facilitates its return to the Treasury for redemption. In previous years when the vaults of the Treasury contained excessive amounts of silver coin there was good reason for stimulating its use among the people by the inducement of free transportation to depositors therefor, but at present such conditions do not prevail. It is suggested for the consideration of bankers, merchants, and others requiring the use of large amounts of this coin, that they retain their accumulation during the inactive periods for use in the busy season instead of returning them to the Treasury for redemption, and thus lighten the burden upon the Government that is constantly growing, and which may, in the interest of economy, soon have to be discontinued altogether.

Gentlemen, just one thing more.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman what this silver is taken to the Treasury to be redeemed in—currency?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, it is exchanged for other money; that is all. Now, we have just provided, gentlemen, this session of Congress, for the further use of small denominations of silver certificates, cutting the large ones, as a substitute for silver dollars or anything else. Of course they are based on silver dollars. We have also provided for five and ten dollar gold certificates to meet the demand for small denominations. You can not increase the circulation of silver or get it out into circulation beyond the amount which the Government has in stock. You can not do that. Of course the only effect now, the only possible effect, of spending $125,000 for the free transportation of legal-tender silver is to carry it around and around and around and let the dishonest man avail himself of the broadness of this law while the honest man pays his transportation for other forms of money. Now, that is about all there is to it. The silver question is not involved a particle.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman when this silver, as the gentleman says, goes "around and around and around," whether or not it is not paying debts "around and around and around?"

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes; but when it goes around and around sealed up in bags, only performing one use each time it goes, and the expense is $7.50 for a thousand dollars, it is not good economy, I submit to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you are going to curtail that expense by letting it go on the——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is the situation. There are no politics in it; there is no silver question in it. It is simply a question of an economical policy, the necessity for the present practice having long since passed away, and no possible legitimate benefit accruing to anybody to-day by the continuing of it.

Mr. SMYSER. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was before the House on a previous occasion I wrote a letter or two to my district on this subject. I have here thirty letters from the bankers in my district. We have not any large banks. We have a few where the capital is from a hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars. Every one of those replies, Mr. Chairman, shows that the old plan of the Government paying the transportation of the silver dollar ought to be adhered to, not in the interest of the banks, but in the interest of the people.

I may not know as much as my friend from Connecticut, but we have some people out in my district who, in their humble way, do happen to know just what the needs of the people are. Allow me to read. Here is one banker who says:

> Under the present condition all banks are on an equal footing, while under the proposed plan those banks situated near a subtreasury would have the advantage.

Mr. Chairman, you talk about the circulation of the silver certificate. In my district it is a rarity to see a one-dollar bill. It is nearly as much so as it is here in Washington to see a silver dollar. The silver dollar with my people is the currency of the people, and they ought to have it, not because the banks are benefited by it, but it is the change, it is the currency, of the people.

Let me call your attention to another letter:

> The banks receive no profit, as it is merely an accommodation to the people in general, and the banks will tell you that the largest number of requests for silver come from those who do not carry a bank account. Should this change be made, banks will carry a sufficient supply for their own needs, and will to some extent let the people, other than their customers, look out for themselves. It is to the interest of the Government—and for that reason alone they have heretofore paid these charges—to keep silver in circulation, which they can well afford to do, owing to the profit the Government derives from the coinage of silver dollars and subsidiary coin and the low rate of transportation the Government is able to obtain under its contract with the United States Express Company, which is about one-third of that which individuals and banks are compelled to pay.

Now, here is a letter from a bank at Coshocton of which my predecessor in this House is president, and he says:

The present law by which the Government pays for transportation is a great point for us. We use a great deal of silver; in fact we ship all one and two dollar bills back to the subtreasury at Cincinnati and use silver over the counter and in all pay rolls we make up.

The pay rolls of this institution will average about $65,000 a month, and we ship in on an average about $1,000 to $1,500 in silver every week.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a disadvantage to the inland cities as against the cities where there are subtreasuries, where they can go and take their money to the subtreasury and get silver or any other kind of money they want. They can not do that in the inland banks, but in Cincinnati they can go and get it without paying for it, and the inland banks would have to get it in Cincinnati and pay for it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. How do they get the rest of the money, if they have a pay roll of $65,000 a month and only use $1,000 or $1,500 in silver a week; where do they get the other $64,000?

Mr. SMYSER. I suppose that in ordinary transactions we are not so far behind the times as the gentleman from Connecticut thinks, for in my country we do lots of business by the check system.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But they do pay for the transportation to them on all other forms of money.

Mr. SMYSER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then why not pay for the transportation of silver dollars just the same as they do on the others?

Mr. SMYSER. Because we are always at such a disadvantage as to the means of transacting our business, and we know that while in the East you do not care for the silver dollar, we are willing to have it and use it and pay it out in our business. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitancy I attempt again to discuss this question, which was so fully considered and passed upon by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in January last. Strange will be the attitude of this House if, having in January changed its policy, at the same session it should change back to the old policy, when the change made in January was made on full consideration of the question.

I am not surprised to learn that bankers would like to have the Government of the United States pay the express charges upon any form of currency they use in their business. I am not surprised that individuals who might wish to utilize a particular form of money would be glad to have the United States pay the expense of shipping it to them out of the Treasury.

I have heard much here yesterday and to-day about the disadvantage of the country banker. The country banker has advantages and disadvantages. He has lower rent and lower clerk hire and lower expenses in nearly every line than the city banker. He gets ordinarily a much higher rate of interest than the city banker gets. Because his business is more cheaply conducted along certain lines, I know of no reason why the Government of the United States should consent to pay to him the difference in the expense in other lines of conducting his business at the place where he has seen fit to locate over and above what it would cost to run it at some other place.

It is not the practice of governments to exchange money at all, except to redeem token money. In every country that I know anything about in the world, if you want to exchange one form of money for another form of money in large quantities you have got to pay a small commission for making the exchange. The United States Government alone, of the great nations of the earth, says, "Bring here practically any kind of money recognized by our laws and we will give you any other kind of money that you want without cost." That is practically what we are doing now. We say, "Without profit to the Government, we will make the exchange for you. We will hire the men to count the money out and to count the money in. We will pay all the expenses incident to making the exchange, out of which we profit nothing. We will relieve you of the commission that must be paid in every other country under the sun except this." And then gentlemen come and say, "Oh, yes; but in this transaction, in which the Government of the United States realizes absolutely nothing, it ought also to kindly condescend to pay the expense of transporting our money back to us."

Some of us think that ought to cease. We think it ought to cease, and that the people ought to bear the expense of carrying on their own business in the locality in which they have seen fit to plant themselves. I have listened to my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SMYSER], who says that silver is the currency of his country, and it is the currency of mine. I have heard the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS], who lives in a country where they use paper dollars, appealing for the rights of my people; but I want to say to the gentleman from Maine that there is a question of right and wrong in this case, and it makes no difference to me—the fact that the people of my region use the silver dollar in place of the paper dollar or the paper two-dollar bill. They are not entitled to have a gratuitous exchange of that money with the Government and then make the Government pay the freight on the new money sent out to them.

Mr. LLOYD. How do you expect to get the silver dollar to the people?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I expect the people to pay for getting the silver dollar to them, just as they must pay for getting every other kind of money.

Mr. LLOYD. Then the individual who exchanges his silver for commodities must pay a premium?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, not at all. He does not pay a premium on any other kind of money. We are exchanging gold for silver, we are exchanging gold certificates for gold, we are exchanging silver certificates for silver, but we do not pay the express charges on any of these forms of money, for sending it out to the man with whom we are making the gratuitous exchange, and that does not put any other kind of money at a premium.

[The time of Mr. SMITH of Iowa having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. LLOYD. I want to get at the question what you are going to do with the individual in your country, the man who is to-day using silver money. If you carry out your plan, how is the individual to get the silver?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. He will get the silver just as he gets every other type of money that he gets now, the Government not paying any other kind of express charges.

Mr. LLOYD. Do you expect the individual, if he wants a silver dollar, to send to the Treasury of the United States at Washington to get it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly not. I expect the banks of this country to supply their customers with currency, as they always have done. It has not been the practice of individuals to come to the Treasury at Washington to get other currency and never will be.

Mr. LLOYD. We have always had this law for the free transportation of silver dollars, and you are undertaking to change it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; you have not always had this law.

Mr. LLOYD. I mean in recent times.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You never had this law during the blessed days of free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We did not need it then.

Mr. LLOYD. I understood that this law had been on the statute books——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not until after the remonetization of silver in 1878.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not on the statute books now.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is no law now, save as from year to year we have carried the appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. LLOYD. How long has it been carried as an appropriation?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It has been carried as an appropriation since about two years after the passage of the Bland-Allison Act.

Mr. LLOYD. It commenced in 1881, did it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I gave the gentleman the benefit of a year earlier than that. If he wants to insist upon postponing it a year, I have no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell the committee under what law you make the appropriation for the transportation of fractional coin? Where is the statute authorizing it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is no statute, but we are now coining this fractional currency; we are making a vast profit on it, a profit far in excess of what we ever made upon the standard silver dollar when we were coining it. We pay the express charges on the fractional coin once, and that ends it. We have paid the express charges ten times over upon every dollar of silver now in circulation, and still it comes back. It has been asked here how the silver that comes back is redeemed. It is not all redeemed. Much of it is paid in in customs duties and in payment of internal-revenue taxes and otherwise comes to the public Treasury without being formally redeemed.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. Is not the fault of the money coming back into the Treasury the fault of the customs law requiring the customs collector to send the money direct to the Treasury instead of depositing it in the banks, as provided in a bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, Mr. Chairman, for some reason it does not operate in that way with other forms of money.

Mr. PADGETT. But is not that the fact?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; it is not the fact. If that was the fact, it would operate alike with this and other forms of money.

Mr. PADGETT. Would not the silver be deposited in the local bank and remain in circulation in the community if the law did not compel the customs collector to send the money he collects direct to the Treasury?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say it is not true that that would be the fact.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is it not true that with two forms of money in the bank the bank will send to Washington the money that it can get back free and hold the money that it costs something to transport?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly that is necessarily true, that the bank would prefer to send the money that it could get back without expense to itself rather than the money which it must bring back at its own expense. The whole operation of it is to discredit the silver dollar and brand it as not equal to other forms of money. The Government says it will pay nothing to exchange any other form of money, but that if any human being will take any of these standard silver dollars it will be glad to pay the express charges on them to get rid of them. Gentlemen seem to think that is to the credit of the silver dollar. It is a simple question of square dealing. There is not a bank that would not be glad to have the Government pay all its clerk hire, and if we would pay its clerk hire a while I should expect to get more than thirty letters from any State in the Union protesting against the cutting off of that appropriation after it had once been in existence. We are simply voting money out of the Federal Treasury to pay the expenses of the banks of this country for the benefit of the express companies of this country, and I do hope the House will sustain and adhere to its decision made in January last.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the recent debate has disclosed so many extraordinary things here that I may ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes more than five, in order to try to make some correction of them, not to speak of them as misstatements. I do not criticise the distinguished chairman [Mr. TAWNEY] of my committee for having brought in this bill eliminating the provisions for transportation of silver dollars; but I do criticise him and his distinguished colleague from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] for having twice, thrice, and four times, I believe, stated here on the floor as a reason for doing it that this committee overwhelmingly, at a former period in this session, voted against the matter of carrying silver dollars free by the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not say that, if the gentleman please.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Iowa did in substance, and the chairman of the committee stated it twice; he stated it yesterday and twice to-day.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me, I want to say that it was a mistake; but we adopted it, nevertheless.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will give the facts as they occurred January 20, 1906, when we were here considering the urgent deficiency bill. When there was about one-third of the Members of this House present, late in the evening after we had had some discussion in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and after the committee had rallied all of the friends who were loyal to it—and it always has a great many on a division—the vote stood in favor of my proposition to continue to carry silver dollars free—74 ayes and 63 noes. Then tellers being called some time later, some of the friends of my proposition thinking the matter was settled had gone away, and on the tellers being ordered and a rallying for aid to the committee, the vote stood 70 ayes and 74 noes. And so that is the pretended excuse for saying that the Committee of the Whole ought now to recognize the fact that this committee and the House of Representatives are overwhelmingly opposed to the policy of carrying silver dollars free. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other peculiar thing I wish to call attention to, and that is that it was not believed, I can assume—I was not in the secret—it was not believed by the majority of the Appropriations Committee that it would operate to save much money to the Government to put this provision in the bill as it now appears. The Secretary of the Treasury himself asked to have only $40,000 given for the purpose of carrying fractional silver coin, and the committee understood, what I believe is right, that $40,000 would not begin to reach the amount that would be called for if they struck out the matter of carrying silver dollars, and so they put $35,000 more on top of the Secretary's estimate, and ask now that $75,000 shall be appropriated to carry fractional silver coin in the future as against $40,000 in the past. Such is the provision of the bill we are considering.

But, Mr. Chairman, they will want more in the urgent deficiency bill than we have hitherto appropriated if only fractional silver coin is to be carried free. The amount regularly appropriated for past years for the transportation of silver dollars, including fractional coin, was $120,000, which is only $45,000 more than is carried in the present bill. Forty thousand dollars of the sum appropriated in the past, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, was used for carrying fractional silver. Now, the committee thinks it will take $75,000. I think it will take $150,000 to carry the fractional silver if no silver dollars are authorized to be carried free. The banks, it is said, are the beneficiaries, and yet my friend from Iowa says the people should pay for getting the silver dollar. They are the people who always have to pay; and the banks, in my opinion, won't pay. They do not care; they will want more fractional silver, and will order more largely of it if the Government has it. They will double and treble their former orders, for they will want to use it in their business, the current business about their banks, making change, and the people will have to have more of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said that banks pay out the money that they won't have to pay to get back. I do not believe he knows anything about banks or banking. He is guessing. I do not believe any bank in the United States refuses to pay any money over their counters in these times, save exactly such as their customers want. You go to any bank, and you can get gold, paper money, or silver, just as you may want it. It is the common people, the laborers in the shops, and the farmers who want to pay their farms hands that want silver, and my friend [Mr. SMITH of Iowa] in effect says, "Let them pay for it; let them buy it." This they can not do if they are willing, unless they can arrange to do it through the banks. But the gentleman from Connecticut makes a most extraordinary statement when he says that the time has passed when we ought to pay any attention to the silver dollar; that we have ceased to coin it, and, in effect, he says that the time has come to bury what we have got and repudiate it. That is the statement stripped of the verbiage put upon it. We have now in the United States of standard silver dollars 560,724,865. Now, these silver dollars need to be cared for, but the gentleman thinks, as we are not making any more, we ought not to take care of what we have or use them in circulation. Why discredit them because we are not going to coin any more?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman from Ohio does not want to be unjust to me?

Mr. KEIFER. No; I am not misrepresenting the gentleman.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Every Member of this House who has been here any number of years knows that I have stood in season and out of season for the largest possible use of silver coin and against the use of paper.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, the gentleman was always a good Member, but that does not conflict with the statement he made about the repudiation of the silver dollar. We have silver dollars and we are going to utilize them, in my opinion. We are going to continue to do it. They pass everywhere on a par with gold dollars, and we propose to so maintain them. Now, we had on the 1st day of June, 1905, 100,473,489 silver dollars in circulation.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, we never had that since the world was born. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I got the wrong figures in the table. The gentleman is right. The number of silver dollars in circulation on the 1st day of June, 1905, was 73,617,644. Then, the gentleman says that we are by our process reducing the circulation, and I only refer to this to show that on the 1st day of June, 1906, we had increased that number to 78,602,135, about 5,000,000 over the earlier figure, which answers his claim that if silver dollars are circulated through the country, the Government paying for the distribution, it reduces the amount in circulation. So much for the gentleman's absurd statement.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. If the gentleman will look back five or six years he will find where there were 80,000,000 in circulation, which utterly destroys his argument now.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am trying to deal with the present. The gentleman belongs to the past generation, from the way he talks. [Laughter.] I belong to the younger people here, and I would sooner deal with the present and present conditions. [Laughter and applause.] I have a little curiosity to know just what small amount of truth, if any, there was in the gentleman's statement that we had long since ceased to coin the standard silver dollar, and I have looked to see in the most recent circulation statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated June 1, 1906, and I find that from May 1, 1906, to June 1, 1906, we must have coined nearly 200,000 standard silver dollars, for there are the figures to show it, if you will turn to the circulation statement of that date.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, that is only a difference in circulation, not a statement of coinage.

Mr. KEIFER. No; the gentleman is mistaken. It is the amount of silver dollars on hand. I am not talking of circulation now. This appears under the head of "General stock of money in the United States," in the Secretary of the Treasury's last circulation statement.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That has nothing to do with the coining of it.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, it has something to do with it. How did we get that increase from May 1, 1906 to June 1, 1906, if we did not coin it? [Laughter.] I can not understand the gentleman; but let us look further at the exact figures. The statement under the head just given shows the amount of standard silver dollars on hand in the United States May 1, 1906, was $560,567,885, and June 1, 1906, was $560,724,865.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, Mr. Chairman, this is an important matter, and there are some important things yet to be said. I do not like to detain the House too long.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. It has been said frequently here on this floor, and I am not going into that at length, Mr. Chairman, that we do not pay for the distribution of any other kind of money in this country. There is an item in a paragraph that immediately precedes the one we are now considering, in this very same bill, which carries an appropriation of that kind. It may be very insignificant, but let us see what it is:

> For the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of public money, and for transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $200,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. Now, let me read a little further.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But will not the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KEIFER. Not in the middle of a statement. On the very next page there is an item for transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, of fractional coin and minor coin, and so forth. I will not stop to read it all through, but there, you see, is a further appropriation. Now I will answer the gentleman's question if I can.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Has the gentleman given sufficient attention to the hearings before the committee to know that these are for the transportation of the property of the United States and not——

Mr. KEIFER. So is the other.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not for the transportation of the property of somebody else.

Mr. KEIFER. So is the other.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Between the subtreasuries and the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KEIFER. So are the others the property of the United States, and it is sent to the subtreasuries of the United States and from them to the people that want the money; and they send for the same purpose these notes and securities to the subtreasuries in order that the people may get them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to say that he does not know enough about the hearings to know that this property is not property which is given in exchange by the United States for other money?

Mr. KEIFER. Nobody has said that, and the gentleman is the only person so dull as to make an inquiry of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Ah, but the gentleman did assert that my statement that the Government did not pay transportation for other money given in exchange was untrue——

Mr. KEIFER. I did not say it was untrue; I said it was true, and it was carried because the people want it, but the gentleman in his excitement did not hear what I said at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well, what the gentleman said was said loud enough to be heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; but it ought to have had the gentleman's attention. It is a part of the general policy of our great Government to give its notes and securities and its coin out to the people who want them. We want it and need it in the West, and we are wanting to be on an equality in the West and the South with those who live by a mint or a custom-house.

Now, one other thing. There is a story going around here about somebody cheating the Government in one transaction up there at Yonkers, N. Y., and that is given as a reason why you should destroy the whole policy of the Government in the matter of putting its money in circulation, because somebody made a foolish contract, or allowed the Government to be cheated under one. What I am struck with is that this committee when dealing with this question did not—when the Secretary of the Treasury told them he was going to continue that same contract as to the carriage of fractional coin—why they did not ask him to destroy it or cancel it. On the contrary, they do not interfere with it. In his testimony on page 109 of the hearings he says he is going to continue the same contract in the carriage of fractional silver coin that is now here condemned. Then, we have advanced another reason, that some mullet-headed financier or officer out on the Pacific coast sent some silver up to Port Townsend, Wash., and the officer receiving it did not break the seal before he sent it back. They ought to have a business arrangement by which a certificate could have been sent or a certificate drawn on the depository a few miles away at Seattle, where the business could have been done speedily and properly. That is not a good reason. It may be a criticism upon a public officer, but it is not a good reason for abandoning a general policy of the Government which has worked so well for many years.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The only trouble about that would be it would not be in accordance with law.

Mr. KEIFER. Then, make a law that will teach men how to do simple business. We out West do most of our business with checks and drafts, as they do all over the business world. The only reason the banks want this silver is because the people desire it and have to have it in the shops and on the farms. They need it and want it and desire it, and we are not willing to discard it or discredit it and drive it out of circulation as is the evident object or purpose of changing the long-established policy of the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact in your country—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. KEIFER. I can not take time to answer the gentleman now.

Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] is recognized.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the chairman and members of the committee had been heard as much as they desired to be heard.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. KEIFER. But I do not object.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman having had fifteen minutes himself, I appreciate his generosity in asking to cut me off entirely. Mr. Chairman, this debate has furnished an excellent illustration of one of the defects of a republican form of government. It shows clearly how the promptings of selfish interest may carry a scheme through which will work injury to the people of the country as a whole. It also furnishes an illustration of just how a protective tariff is made. The country banker writes to his Representative just as the protected manufacturer writes to his Representative, each asking for his share of Government pap, and the Representative stands upon this floor and pleads for the man who wrote to him, in the one case, stating that the free transportation of silver dollars will be a great convenience to the people of the country who are the customers of the bank; in the other case, he states that the protection given to manufactured articles will increase the scale of wages paid in his particular locality.

As a matter of fact, in both cases the total amount paid by all the taxpayers of the country will be grossly disproportionate to the benefit received by the favorites who alone are benefited. I am not surprised that the country bankers have written to their Representatives. As the gentleman from Iowa stated, they would urge with quite as much zeal that the Government should erect their banking institutions, pay their clerk hire, and pay their taxes also, and they would justify such a procedure on this theory, that it would distribute the money of the country, that it would go out to the people of the country, that it would pay the debts of the country, and that therefore it would be an unwise and unpatriotic thing to interfere with such a scheme of beneficence.

Now, there was some discussion of the form of contract made with the express company. I do not believe that is a material part of this discussion. It enters into it, however, because it shows one of the abuses that have grown up under this system of transporting silver dollars at the Government's expense, but there should be no contract made of any kind. We heard the locality argument upon the floor yesterday and to-day. One gentleman stated the Government should continue to bear this expense because, forsooth, some banks were farther away from subtreasuries than others, and he proposed that the Government continue this carrying of coin and bear this expense as an equalization of advantages between country and city bankers. I remember when the railroad rate bill was under discussion in the House that gentlemen from the same section of the country stood up and loudly demanded that the Interstate Commerce Commission be given power to fix railroad rates upon a distance basis so as to secure to men near the source of supplies the legitimate advantages of their proximity. I admire the consistency of the gentlemen who would equalize the advantages of distance in the transportation of silver and who would not equalize those advantages in the matter of railroad rates.

Now, the original intent of this law was to give silver dollars a wider circulation. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has stated, that intent has failed. From 1898 to 1905, in those seven years, the total amount of silver dollars in circulation increased from $58,000,000 to $73,000,000 only, and it cost the Government—the Government, mark you, in the meantime having paid transportation on $275,000,000, in order that this additional $15,000,000 should be added to the circulation of silver dollars in the country—it cost the Government $522,000 in these seven years for the transportation, back and forth, over and over again, of that $275,000,000. The total amount of silver dollars now in circulation is only about 2½ per cent of the total volume of money in circulation throughout the country. Now, then, the intention of the law has certainly failed, because the amount of silver dollars in circulation per capita to-day is less than it was in 1898. I yield now.

Mr. KEIFER. I interrupt the gentleman only to say that you do not state that amount was to distribute silver coins, including fractional currency, as well as the dollar.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. No; I do not intend to say that.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the fact.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think not. I will read you the statement of the officer.

Mr. KEIFER. We appropriate for all together.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will read from the statement of the officer of the Treasury Department on that point, if I can find it, if the House will indulge me a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I can not find the testimony readily, but I read it this morning. The statement of Mr. Keep, of the Treasury Department, was, that they had paid transportation on 275,000,000 silver dollars in the period from 1898 to 1905.

Here is his statement, on pages 24 and 25 of this year's hearings on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill:

> Mr. KEEP. Yes. On page 15 of this year's report of the Secretary of the Treasury it is stated that the silver dollars in circulation on June 30, 1898, were $58,000,000, while the amount of silver dollars in circulation on June 30, 1905, was $73,000,000. The amount transported at Government expense between those dates was $275,000,000, at an average cost to the Government of $1.90 per thousand. That is, out of 480,000,000 silver dollars, the amount in actual circulation has been increased from $58,000,000 to $73,000,000, or about $15,000,000. That covers seven years.

That is the fact; but this is the expenditure of the Treasury Department for the carriage of silver dollars alone. Now, how did it happen——

Mr. JOHNSON. If they have shipped $275,000,000 in seven years, it is an argument that the country wants it, and that it has found its way back through the regular channels of trade.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will proceed, with the permission of the gentleman, to show that it is not an argument that the country needs it, but rather that it has permitted a great abuse. Now, then, the amount of silver dollars increased in circulation in this seven years was $15,000,000. The amount of silver dollars transported by the Government at its expense was $275,000,000.

These two statements seem to be irreconcilable; but they are not, because a great many bankers shipped these silver dollars back and forth for no purpose except a selfish purpose of their own. Take, for illustration, the fact that a new bank starts in a town. The old bank naturally feels jealous of it and wishes to make trouble for it, and they commence paying the balances and ship silver dollars from the subtreasury to the new bank, and the new bank is handicapped, for it can not handle all the silver dollars in the transaction of its business.

Take the case of Boston. In 1899 the bankers of New England attempted to remove the charges for exchange upon checks and drafts, and about 90 per cent of the bankers of that section agreed to establish the new practice. About 10 per cent of them refused. Thereupon the merchants of Boston attempted to exercise power to compel the 10 per cent to agree to the establishment of that practice. Instead of sending the checks to the country banks by mail they sent them by express and the express agent presented them in person and thus saved the charge for collection—the exchange. The country banks sought for a weapon to prevent the city banks from compelling them to establish this practice. Accordingly they had shipped down to the banks of the city of Boston silver dollars which they had received from the subtreasury at the expense of the United States Government.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. When I finish this statement. At this point the silver dollars began to accumulate in the clearing-house vault, the clearing house having acted, as was proper, as the agent for the Boston banks. Now, then, they could not get currency from the subtreasury fast enough to exchange for these silver dollars, and the subtreasury notified the clearing house that they could not receive any more silver dollars, and as a result the total volume of this was thrown back into the vaults of the clearing house, and from August 23 to November 8, in 1901, 2,500,000 silver dollars accumulated in the vaults of the clearing house in Boston. Now, then, that illustrates perfectly one of the abuses that has grown out of this system. It does not accommodate the people, but enables a few selfish bankers to profit at the expense of the Government of the United States, which is but another form of stating that they profited at the expense of all the taxpayers of the United States. They have used this provision of the law, not to execute the law according to its intent, but to furnish themselves with a club to accomplish their own selfish ends.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman's speech, but I should like two minutes after he has finished his remarks in which to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] has expired.

[By unanimous consent the time of Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts was extended three minutes.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is a reason for the transportation of fractional coin that does not exist in favor of silver dollars. The Government last year made a profit of about a million dollars in coining and distributing fractional coin. It makes no such profit in the case of the silver dollar. It makes no profit, as I understand it, in this distribution, but is subjected only to a loss. Now, every kind of money in the country, except the silver dollar and fractional coin, is transported at the expense of the bankers of the country. The silver dollar alone is entitled to this advantage, and it is in practice a discrimination against other kinds of money.

Now, gentlemen have been very eloquent in defense of the silver dollar, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] in particular, and as I heard him speak of the surreptitious manner in which the House silently passed the item striking out the transportation of the silver dollar in January, 1906, it reminded me singularly of the old wail about the crime of 1873, and I suppose if he had had more time he would have made us again familiar with that ancient strain. But these gentlemen who are so eloquent in defense of their country banking constituents have failed yet to give the House one single substantial reason why the silver dollar should be transported at the expense of the Government and why the gold dollar and paper currency should not. Now, the people of the country will get the silver dollar, no matter whether the Government pays the expense of transportation or whether it is paid by the bankers. I find that the total cost of transportation to the Government under the present rate is less than one-fifth of 1 per cent of the value of silver dollars, and if there is a great demand in any section of the country for silver dollars, inexplicable as this demand must seem to many of us, that demand will be satisfied by the bankers. They are in duty bound to satisfy the demands of their customers, and they will not be deterred by reason of having to pay this slight transportation charge from accommodating their customers with silver dollars any more than they are deterred now from satisfying the legitimate demands of business in the northern and eastern sections of the country by furnishing to their customers currency and paying the expense of transportation themselves. I am aware that if a proposition were made upon this floor to furnish Members and their constituents with suits of clothes at the expense of the Government there are men upon both sides of this House who would take the floor and eloquently defend that proposition, but there does not seem to be any sound reason for continuing this great abuse, from which the Adams Express Company and the United States Express Company alone derive such great profits. It is time that the interests of all the taxpayers of the country were consulted, even if we have to deprive the country banker of the slight advantage of getting free transportation of the silver dollars which he now uses at the expense of the United States Government. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendments be closed in two minutes, which time I desire to yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will defer that motion for two minutes, so that I may have time to make a statement about these express companies.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that all debate on the pending paragraphs be closed in two minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his courtesy.

The motion of Mr. TAWNEY was agreed to.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the conditions referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], in the concrete example which he cites occurring several years ago between the Boston clearing-house and certain country banks, when rightly understood are a strong reason for continuing this policy and appropriation. I was one of the persons interested in that controversy between the banks in northern Maine, northern New Hampshire, and northern Vermont, all along the Canadian border, and the clearing house of Boston. It was, in short, an attempt on the part of the clearing house to compel these country banks to change their methods of doing business, to cease collecting exchange on remittances; in brief, to force those banks to collect checks and drafts and remit exchange on Boston free of any charge which, under the peculiar conditions existing on the border, they were unwilling to do.

These banks had to take various kinds of currency from their depositors and patrons, including Canadian money. They charged the Boston banks for collections and remittances to them $1 a thousand. This arrangement had apparently been satisfactory for many years, until they decided to collect through the clearing house. Then the trouble bagan. The clearing house declined to pay. They sent their checks through the express companies, the banks having charged it $1 a thousand for exchange on remittances. What happened? This great clearing house sent word to the banks in my county and to the banks in northern Vermont saying, "You must send us lawful money for every check and every draft that we forward by express for collection."

I myself personally made an arrangement with the agent of the American Express Company by which, in exchange for those checks and drafts from the clearing house on banks where I was interested we were to pay by cashiers' checks on Boston—of course, paying the full amount; no discount for exchange. By this arrangement the express companies would make what the banks had been charging, but the clearing house said, "No; you can not pay this way; we must have lawful money. We will drive you into conceding what we have asked." At least, no other interpretation could be put upon this action. What did we do then? We brought silver from the subtreasury, and we gave them lawful money, and they had it until they got tired of it. Then we resumed our old method of doing business, and everything has moved smoothly and, I presume, satisfactorily ever since, and now we are going on as we were before the difficulty. We gave them more lawful money than they wanted. As the gentleman from Massachusetts brought this matter to the attention of the committee, I have felt that it was but fair to present the other side of it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You gave it to them at the expense of the Government?

Mr. POWERS. It was they who began it. Think of the great clearing house of Boston refusing to take for its checks and drafts the cashiers' checks of banks whose stock was held at more than 200 per cent and demanding lawful money in order to drive these country banks to do their work for nothing! It was because this law and appropriation were in existence that we were able to maintain our rights and furnish the lawful money demanded. That is the whole history of that Boston silver-dollar clearing-house transaction. I think I know about it and have stated it correctly, and I do not believe that incident furnishes any such argument against continuing this appropriation to carry silver dollars at Government expense as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] claims for it, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will be adopted.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent for thirty seconds, in which to make a statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to yield to my colleague, but the committee has closed debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by the committee. The only question before the House now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], to strike out the word "fractional."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 89, noes 53.

Mr. TAWNEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. KEIFER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 54.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, in order to make the bill read as it did for the current year, I move to amend by adding, in line 22, page 24, after the word "coin," the words "including fractional silver coin."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, in line 22, after the word "coin," insert the words "including fractional silver coin."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, a further amendment, which will make the amount the same as it has been heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers a further amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk:

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23 strike out "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and twenty."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I understand debate is closed on this amendment, on the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply want to say that it is unnecessary to increase this appropriation, even with the amendment adopted by the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think the gentleman should debate this unless he allows me to do so also.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not debating it. I am only stating a fact.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, that is in the nature of debate. [Laughter.] This will make it exactly as it was last year.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. KEIFER; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 61, noes 45.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, of fractional silver coin, and of minor coin under each of the three foregoing appropriations shall, when practicable, be by registered mail and in such sums as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine and under such rules and conditions as may be agreed upon jointly by him and the Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the language from line 16 to 22, inclusive. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if either the Secretary of he Treasury or the Postmaster-General was heard by the committee with reference to this proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that the Treasury Department was heard in respect to the transportation of securities, which includes currency and silver coin, and the information which we obtained from the Department was that, if authority was given for its transportation by registered mail, it would save the Government one-half the expense which is now met and paid for out of the appropriation made for this purpose.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I renew my question, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury or the Postmaster-General was heard?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Secretary of the Treasury was heard.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Was the Postmaster-General heard?

Mr. TAWNEY. Except this, the Secretary of the Treasury said under existing conditions it was impracticable, in his judgment, to transport money by registered mail; but when he was asked the question by my colleague [Mr. SMITH] why it was impracticable he said:

I will confess that I can not say why. The question has never before been presented to me.

Now, after that we had the gentleman in the Department before the committee whose business it is to handle the transportation of money, and he made the statement that if it was made possible for the Treasury Department to transport money by registered mail rather than by express they could save at least one-half of the amount now appropriated for that purpose. We accepted that proposition, but we did not reduce the appropriation to that extent. While the appropriation of the current law is $378,000, practically all of which is spent for the transportation of money, we recommend $287,000, a reduction of $91,000, which is a great deal more than will be necessary, and which will be enough to defray the expense of the transportation of the silver dollars by registered mail without the increase which the committee just voted on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, who knows nothing about the amount required.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this is a subject of too much importance, in my judgment, to warrant the House in passing this provision until at least the Postal Department has had an opportunity to be heard with reference to the burdens it might place on that service. I know, in a general way, that some years ago the subject was taken up by the Treasury officials and, after an investigation, recommendation was against the very character of proposition that is carried in this paragraph of the bill. We are endeavoring to eliminate, as far as possible, from the mail matter that is not strictly mailable matter. The registry department, as I understand it, is not prepared to take over such a burden as this proposition would impose. Whether or not it would require safes in each apartment car and post-office car, whether it might not require a postal clerk to be armed as express messengers are armed in order to protect the valuable coin, or whether we have sufficient registry clerks in the various registry post-offices, or whether it may entail additional expense even in the screen-wagon service for the transportation of this coin, I do not know. I do not want to be considered as entirely antagonizing the proposition, but I certainly feel that it ought not to be carried in this bill, but should go out on a point of order for the purpose of giving an opportunity for a more thorough investigation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that he is opposed to saving this large amount of money?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Ah, that is not the proposition I made. I do not know whether this is to be a charge against the postal receipts or not. I have contended on various occasions that a studied effort is made by various Departments to load the postal service with charges which these Departments have escaped. It is a matter of bookkeping, in some instances.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; it is a matter of transferring the transportation of this money and coin from the express companies.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It may or may not be. There has been no investigation of this proposition by the postal authorities, nor has the Secretary of the Treasury even been called before the Committee on Appropriations to give his individual views.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Those under him were called, and they were the men who knew all about it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not in favor of some understrapper or clerk fixing a policy which might entail heavy burdens on the postal service.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Would the gentleman see any objection to this section or paragraph if a clause is added providing that no such security or money shall be transported by registered mail at less than the actual cost of the service?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to make it imperative to transport these securities and coin by registered mail.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But this does not make it imperative.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The word "shall" I interpret to mean imperative.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It says "shall be practicable."

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is all right enough; but the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General now have authority to negotiate under existing law, just as you in this paragraph propose. Let those two officials representing those great Departments in some way be considered, and then let this recommendation come to Congress. I insist, Mr. Chairman, upon the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, when this paragraph was drawn, it was drawn with the idea and in the belief that it was a limitation upon the expenditure of the three preceding appropriations in respect to the transportation of money. It was also drawn for the purpose of saving at least a hundred thousand dollars now paid to the express companies. It was not carefully considered, however, from the standpoint of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads—that is, that the Government of the United States is only a part of the Post-Office Department. We supposed that the fact that the Government would save at least a hundred thousand dollars by this provision that that fact would have sufficient weight with him and other Members to prevent him from invoking a technicality in order to defeat it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In what way?

Mr. TAWNEY. And it was thought that inasmuch as the Post-Office Department, which we supposed was a branch of the Government and was maintaining all of the facilities for carrying mail for citizens, including the moneys of the banks of the country, would, if it were given an opportunity to negotiate with the Secretary of the Treasury or confer with him in regard to the conditions under which such transportation should be conducted, there was no Member of the House who would object to the transportation of the Government's money by registered mail. This view of the situation was reenforced by the fact that such transportation could not take place until the Postmaster-General had consented to the rules and conditions under which the money was to be transported. For that reason we did not deem it necessary to first obtain the consent of the Department which the gentleman from Indiana represents. But inasmuch as the committee was not as careful in drafting this provision as it otherwise would have been, had the committee supposed for a moment that any Member of the House would object to a saving of $100,000 in the transportation of money which has heretofore been paid to the express companies of the United States and we will continue to pay if this provision goes out on a point of order. I presume that the point of order is well taken, and when the Chair rules sustaining the point of order, I wish to offer the following substitute.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I submit that, having made a point of order and the Chair having recognized the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to speak upon the merits of the provision, that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] can not lift me off the floor with any such maneuver as he has just practiced.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman from Indiana reserved the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I had made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I do not allow the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to put into my mouth any motive for the point which I have raised which did not exist in my own mind. I have insisted that this proposition has not been considered by either the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Postmaster-General. I take issue with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] as to the proposition that the Government in its postal facilities is already equipped to take over this service. I also take issue with him relative to the saving. You can not necessarily take the difference between what the registered postal rates now are and what may now be paid under contracts to express companies for this service and give that as a net saving.

If the service must be equipped with safes, as express companies are now equipped for the holding of that money; if it should be found that the postal employees would necessarily have to be equipped with arms to protect this fund, as express messengers are now equipped; if it should be found that additional weight, by virtue of the coin which is transported, would increase the cost of wagon service and the cost of railway-mail pay, then it becomes a serious question as to whether there would be economy in this or not. I shall not be frightened with the ghosts of express companies hurled at me by the chairman of this committee, nor swerve from what I am pleased to consider my duty in representing another committee of this House of quite as much importance as the one having charge of this measure. I think the gentleman will understand that I raise this point for the reason that this committee which has come here with the recommendation confesses that it has not interrogated either the Secretary of the Treasury nor the Postmaster-General with reference to this proposition, and I stated a fact a moment ago that a measure substantially similar to this was under consideration some years ago and, after investigation by the Treasury officials, was recommended against. Unless there are some new conditions, I have the right to assume in the face of that report that that Department would still be glad to be heard upon the proposition before it should be railroaded through the House. I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a few minutes. I am in sympathy with the committee with reference to the paragraph now being considered, but I do not think that the voluntary statement made by the chairman of the committee that no one else except himself and a few around him know anything about what is intended to be done under the bill, and especially what he says with reference to myself was very generous. I understood the bill to mean exactly what it says; and it now reads, after the amendments put in it on my motions, exactly, word for word, the same as a similar provision in the sundry civil act for the current year, and it provides, as did that, that the money should be carried by "registered mail or otherwise." That is the language of the bill, as drawn by the committee, relating to the transportation of fractional silver coin, and that is the exact language of the law in former years, and yet the distinguished chairman tells us that we have not the occult knowledge he possesses to know what he and others meant by using it. He intimates that the Government is going to carry the silver coin by some other means than by express. The bill as originally drawn is not changed as to the mode of carrying silver coin by my amendments. I supposed we are going to carry it according to the provisions of the bill and the former law, and therefore I was in favor of appropriating the same money that we appropriated in former years to do the same thing. If it can be done cheaper, I shall be very glad, and then the money appropriated need not be expended.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand the Chair sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet ruled, but the Chair will sustain the point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. TAWNEY. I offer that as a substitute for the paragraph eliminated by the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota for the section which has been stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

This sum and the appropriations for contingent expenses independent Treasury and for transportation of fractional silver coin shall be available only for transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, of silver coin and of minor coin, except when impracticable, by registered mail and not otherwise, and in such sums as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, and under such rules and conditions as may be agreed upon jointly by him and the Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment. As I heard the amendment read, it makes provision for transportation by registered mail and not otherwise. Under existing law it may be transported by registered mail or otherwise, and the striking out of the alternative is unquestionably a change of law, and therefore obnoxious to the rule which prohibits legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it matters not whether that language is there or is not there. There is no law on the subject to-day. There is an appropriation for the transportation of coin by registered mail or otherwise. This paragraph now reads "by registered mail, except when impracticable," so that it merely would change the existing appropriation with respect to the discretion in respect to the transportation of money. As it now reads it is within the discretion of the Department to transport it by registered mail or otherwise; but however that may be, the provision as now drawn is a direct limitation upon the expenditure of these three appropriations for the transportation authorized by the three preceding appropriations.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would say, in explanation, I voted against the gentleman on the original vote on this measure, but I am inclined to sympathize with him and support him now, but I would like to know if he, in his investigation of the question, has arrived at a clear, strong opinion that it will be cheaper to transport this silver under the control and direction of the post-office authorities, and if so, how he has arrived at that conclusion?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman who gave the information is a gentleman employed——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let me ask who the gentleman was?

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). In the Treasury Department, perhaps better qualified to give an opinion than even the Secretary of the Treasury himself, because he is familiar with the details. That gentleman was Mr. Daskam, of the Treasury Department. He was asked as to the cost of transportation by express, and he replied:

After a certain number of miles it is four-tenths of a cent per mile. It could go about 250 miles for a dollar—

That is, for a thousand dollars' worth of silver—

No distance now is over a dollar—that is, over the lines of the United States Express Company. If it goes over more than one express company, then each company gets a dollar. If the United States Express Company can take it all the way, then the rate is a dollar.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If it goes by two companies——

Mr. TAWNEY. It is $2; and if it goes by three companies it is $3.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Each company gets the maximum.

Mr. TAWNEY. Each company gets the maximum. Now, a thousand dollars' worth of silver weighs a fraction less than 60 pounds. If that thousand dollars is divided into packages under the existing registration law or regulation, it would have to be in 4-pound packages, and would cost 8 cents a package; but under this provision, if the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General can agree upon the rules and conditions for the transportation of silver by registered mail, they can make that package a 60-pound package, which would cost the Government 8 cents for the transportation under existing rules and under existing law, or they can increase it, as it would be entirely within the discretion of the two officials of the two Departments interested.

In the matter of investigating or inquiry of the Postmaster-General in advance as to whether this could not be done, the committee, of course, took official notice of the fact that the Post-Office Department is to-day transporting not only money by registered mail, but a great many valuable packages at rates greater than the present limitation as to the weight of the package. It has all the facilities, and the committee simply concluded that the Government could utilize these same facilities, provided that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General could agree upon the size of the packages and the rules and conditions on which they could be transported. We did not assume to limit their discretion in the premises. Now, taking into consideration the amount we are paying for the transportation of a thousand dollars of silver, and the cost at which it can be transported by registered mail, which in fact would be a mere rate per pound that the Government must pay for the transportation of all mails, except this actual cost of transportation the additional expense would be merely a transfer of the money from one pocket of the Government to the other. The pound rate would be the only actual expense to the Government, which would be a great economy as compared with the costs the Government is now paying the express companies.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman's explanation is quite satisfactory.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist that this is practically a limitation upon these three appropriations. It does not involve a change in existing law, because there is no existing law, and it limits the expenditure, and the result of reducing the expenditure in the aggregate amounts to from $90,000 to $100,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, if there is no law, then this is law; and the committee can not, under the rules, legislate upon an appropriation bill. I care not which horn of the dilemma the gentleman may take; he must confess it is subject to the point of order under the rules. If, then, he contends that this is a limitation, I direct the attention of the Chair to the language of the amendment, which specifies this transportation shall be "only" by registered mail. That is not a limitation, except by way of changing the law. My understanding as to the determination of a limitation, which I fear has been somewhat enlarged upon in recent years in the decisions, is, if the limitation of the methods or plan is clearly legitimate under the provision of some existing law, it does not violate or change that law. But this amendment unquestionably, if there is no law, makes a law which requires the Department to provide a certain kind of transportation. If there is a law, then it changes that law by striking out the alternative provision that the law carries.

I believe it is clearly subject to the point of order. Now, a word on the merits of the amendment.

The gentleman from Minnesota has demonstrated, in my mind, the wisdom of further investigation before we should act upon such an important question. The gentleman spoke of the amount now paid to the express companies, and urged that changing the method of transportation would be economy to the Treasury Department; but he does not state, as he should, that it would add to the expense of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think I will not yield, for the reason that I shall insist on the point of order; but I want just a word upon the merits of the amendment. We pay now for the carrying of mail, on an average—that is, the expense for all the handling—from 5 to 8 cents a pound. Take, therefore, this matter from express transportation and let it go through the mail, and it would cost at least as much as it now costs to handle second-class mail matter. Somebody must handle it. If a thousand dollars in coin weighs 60 pounds, the gentleman can take his pencil and scratch pad and ascertain the cost, not to the Treasury, but to the Government; and it will manifest itself in an assumed deficit, but, as a matter of fact, a charge upon the postal service. But here is the point that I insist upon. For a great many years a certain method has been practiced. To suddenly change this method and require, by an arbitrary, peremptory requirement of a statute that the postal service shall take over this coin transportation, and that it shall be done as registered mail, is unwise. There should be given more time for investigation before such change is determined upon. I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think it is no use wasting the time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will yield to the gentleman in the interest of saving the time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it will cost more to transport by mail than by express?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not by the strict postal rates; but if we are obliged to put safes in the cars in which to protect the money, and have to arm the postal employees as express messengers are armed, with the additional weight, which would increase the cost of wagon service and the cost of transportation between post-office and the depots, that would become part of the charge.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that the Government transports millions of dollars for banks, and that in addition to the fractional currency?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is transporting coin.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They do transport coin?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I give you the authority of the gentleman from Minnesota; he says it is not now being transported by the mails.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the direct statement that it will cost the taxpayers of the country less to transport this coin under the auspices of the post-offices than by the express companies.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I so understood him, but I somewhat question that; and I desire it to be inquired into.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you know whether it is true or not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was simply inquiring upon what he bases that. He claims that it is a fact; that one officer did give that statement. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. A long line of decisions on the question of limitations holds that the limitation, to be in order, must be in effect simply a negative bar that is pressing upon the appropriation of the money, and that any amendment which directly or indirectly vests in any executive officer any discretion or imposes any duty upon the officer, directly or indirectly, in the expenditure of the money would be obnoxious to the point of order. This amendment seems to the Chair to come clearly within the latter class; and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lands and other property of the United States: For custody, care, protection, and expenses of sales of lands and other property of the United States, the examination of titles, recording of deeds, advertising, and auctioneer's fees, $200.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say that I may be absent when the provision on page 75 in this bill is reached, and I desire to send to the Clerk's desk an amendment, which I ask to have read and be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have read for information and have pending an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "hundred," on page 75, line 20, the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

"For topographical surveys in various portions of the United States, $350,000, to be immediately available."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is not the proper place to offer an amendment. I understood that the amendment was to be read for information, but I gave no permission to offer it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I said that I wished it to be read for information.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the amendment might be considered as pending when the paragraph was reached.

Mr. GRAHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the cut made by the committee of $50,000 in the appropriation for continuing topographic surveys—a cut of one-seventh of the amount considered necessary by the Department and also of the amount appropriated for this work last year—is, I consider, a great injustice, if not a vital blow, to that great work. I consider this one of the most important branches of work that has ever been undertaken by the Government. So important is it that my State of Pennsylvania has already appropriated $112,000 in cooperation with the Government, and our people are satisfied that no other moneys appropriated by the State has brought so great a return to its industrial activities. We realize that the States are not in a position to make these surveys independent of the General Government. Besides, were this work carried on independently by the States, it would be on a heterogeneous system. The maps of one State would not match with those of another, and there would be no continuity between the investigations in neighboring portions of the country.

As the reports of the United States Geological Survey have shown, detailed topographic mapping has been completed of 18,245 square miles in Pennsylvania, or 40 per cent of the total area of the State, which is 45,212 square miles. Annual progress in this work on the basis of $14,000 of State funds is at the rate of nearly 1,400 square miles, or about $10 per square mile. This is considered to be an unusually low figure, in view of the rough and intricate topographic conformation of the State.

This work has been expedited in the past chiefly in the more important mineral-bearing regions, the anthracite region of the east and the bituminous coal, oil, and gas areas of the west, as well as over the cement districts in eastern Pennsylvania and coal and clay bearing districts in the western part of the State.

As the work progresses and the topographical maps are completed, geologic surveys follow, and indicate the direction in which extensive mineral resources may be sought, and the results of this work have been the extension to a considerable outlying area of the known mineral-bearing formation.

The surveys made in the past year in the vicinity of Pittsburg were not city surveys in the ordinary sense. All existing maps of Pittsburg, Allegheny, Homestead, and other municipalities were compiled and brought together, and unmapped areas were surveyed and the whole assembled into one great map covering one of the most important industrial regions in the United States. No city and no State could have brought this work together in the same time and at the same expense. The result has been to develop the known area of underground water supplies, which are now being tapped for artesian water; and the knowledge of the slopes of the surface has expedited the construction of trolley and railway lines and otherwise aided and developed the resources of the region.

In the summer of 1901 the Wabash Railroad Company was locating a railroad line from the Ohio River across Jefferson and Harrison counties, Ohio, to connect with the Wheeling and Lake Erie Railroad, and thus bring the Wabash across the Ohio River into Pittsburg, and during the same summer a contour topographic map of the region referred to was being constructed by the United States Geological Survey. The railway surveys were completed; a location chosen; grades, cuts, etc., including a tunnel, decided upon, and contracts for construction awarded, when advance copies of the topographic map that was being made came to hand. From an inspection of the map the possibility of a shorter route, with equally favorable grades and without the necessity of a tunnel, was discovered. The new location was at once adopted, and resulted in the saving of $80,000 in construction. This correction of a detailed railway survey with the aid of a contour topographic map was made possible by a study of the map itself and without expense.

The people of Allegheny County have long desired to have this work in that county completed, and they are pleased to know that it has now been resumed and that it is expected will be completed this year. From this it may be seen, therefore, that my interest in this matter is due to the fact that I realize its importance to the entire country. The Chief of Staff of the Army has stated that this work will be of inestimable value to the country in time of active military operations, as these maps show all features of surface relief, location of wooded areas, heights of hills, all roads, houses, streams; the possible strategic positions, such as cuts and fills on railways and on highways; length, height, and kinds of bridges; fordable and unfordable streams, etc.

The Department of Agriculture needs these maps as a basis for soil survey and studies whereby the agricultural values of the lands for the growing of more useful crops may be studied. On the coast of North Carolina and in Connecticut the values of agricultural lands have been more than doubled as the result of soil surveys based on these topographic maps, as showing where more valuable garden truck and tobacco lands exist. It is essential that the General Land Office, in its dealings with railway grants, school lands, and individual settlers, may know officially whether certain lands are mineral, agricultural, forest, etc., and the basis of this classification of the various resources is indicated and studied. The forestry bureau of the State uses the maps as a basis for its forest studies. The hydrographic branch of this survey gauges the streams and determines the water power available for industrial purposes and the water resources available for city water.

Surveys made north of Pittsburg in my own and in other Congressional districts have added materially to the information needed in connection with improving the waterways and securing data toward the construction of the Pittsburg and Lake Erie Canal. During the past two years a commission of engineers has been engaged in making a study of the possibilities of building a ship canal connecting Lake Erie and the Ohio River. The purpose of this canal will be to carry the vast traffic in ores and fuels between the Great Lakes, Pittsburg, and the Mississippi Valley. In cooperation with the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio the topographers of the Geological Survey had nearly completed the mapping of the region involved, when the engineers of the ship canal came across their topographic maps. They found these of inestimable value in furthering their studies, covering, as they did, a much more extended area than could any mere location or trial surveys. They showed conclusively the lowest passes between the head waters of the Ohio and the Great Lakes, saved thousands of dollars in useless surveys, possibly years of time in field work by indicating the exact altitudes separating the lakes and rivers, and showing where the final location might be sought and where the water supply might be stored for operating the summit level and the locks.

This information could not have been procured in such conclusive form by any ordinary trial surveys; nothing but a topographic survey completely covers the ground in such efficient manner. Moreover, a State could not have done this unaided. The area under investigation was extended as far into Ohio as into Pennsylvania and the Federal Government was able to conduct this topographic mapping systematically in both States in a manner in which neither State could have operated it singly. The same is true of the extensive oil and coal bearing lands. Some of the most important problems bearing upon these resources are found in the bordering States of Ohio and West Virginia, and this work could have been carried on only through the mediation of the Federal survey.

In this connection I desire to remark that the State of Pennsylvania is particularly interested in the work of fuel tests and testing the structural materials. It produces one-half of the fuels of the United States, and double the amount of cement, clays, and other structural materials than that of any State. The investigations being undertaken in connection with these subjects are of vital importance to the producers of fuels, cements, and clays in Pennsylvania, as they aid in insuring the best methods of utilizing the fuels and of treating and preparing for market the structural materials.

The demand for this topographic work has been so strong and so persistent from all parts of the country that, indeed, I feel that this amount is not altogether sufficient, but I have offered an amendment to restore the item to $350,000, the amount asked for by the Department, and I ask the House to appropriate at least that amount.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance of marine-hospital stations, including subsistence, and for all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $240,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That of this sum such portion equal in amount to the cost of maintenance and subsistence of any given marine-hospital station during the current fiscal year shall not be expended in case the said hospital station be closed during any part of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unless the gentleman wishes to be heard on the point of order, I would be glad to have him make it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I should be glad to hear the gentleman's statement and explanation of the proviso before I determine whether to insist on the point of order or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to make the statement, although I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order, being a limitation upon the appropriation. It was announced some time ago through the public press that it was the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury to close fourteen of the twenty-one existing marine hospitals, and during the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations there was some testimony as to whether that purpose was to be carried out or not. The reason for it, it has been stated, is that it would effect a great saving of cost, yet Surgeon-General Wyman, the head of the Marine-Hospital Service, testified before the committee that he had made the estimates for the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the expense of conducting the Marine-Hospital Service and the expense that would be entailed on the Government if the sailors and river men were cared for in public hospitals, and that there would not be a dollar saved to the country by the change of programme.

The effect of my amendment is that if the Secretary of the Treasury should undertake to close any of the marine hospitals, then the amount of money that has been expended during the current year for the maintenance and subsistence at such hospital shall be subtracted from the sum hereby appropriated. To illustrate, if at the marine hospital in Louisville, Ky., there was expended $30,000 for maintenance and subsistence of river men during the present year, then, in the event that hospital is closed during the coming fiscal year, the sum of $30,000 would be subtracted from the amount herein appropriated, and the Department would not have a right to expend that money.

To be frank with the committee, the real effect of my proviso is to prevent the closing of these hospitals. My reason for that position is twofold. First, I do not believe under the testimony that was given that one dollar would be saved to the country. Second, I do not believe that it is proper for the head of a Department to determine a policy of this kind for the Congress of the United States. It is perfectly proper where some particular case may arise, with some peculiar equity in it, for him to exercise a discretion in the line of economy; but when it comes to determining that after Congress has established twenty-one marine hospitals, purchased the ground, erected the buildings, and made appropriations for maintaining them, that then he of his own accord will terminate that policy of Congress, which has been pursued for years, because he considers it an unwise policy and that a new policy, suggested by him alone, of putting these men at public hospitals shall be taken up. I say that is unjustifiable and a departure from the proper theory of executive and legislative functions.

It would be just as proper if the Secretary of War should determine that it would be cheaper to put all the old soldiers in poorhouses throughout the country and abolish all the soldiers' homes, and I for one am opposed to this practice that has grown up in recent years of heads of Departments undertaking to determine for Congress what shall be the policy of Congress in regard to such matters.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Government by bureaucracy.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am opposed to Government by bureaus, and this is a species of it without any reason.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I fully agree with the gentleman on the general proposition, but I want to ask if it is not a fact that there is a statute expressly authorizing the closing and sale of marine hospitals by the head of that Department, so that in this case it is not a usurpation, as it is in so many others.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not claiming that it is a usurpation without any color of law for it, but I do claim that such wholesale action as is proposed is a usurpation in the true sense of the term. There is a statute that authorizes either the lease or sale of a marine hospital under certain conditions, with two exceptions relative to two hospitals that were named, which can not be sold or leased; but I have been unable to find any law that now exists for the practice of having sailors cared for in hospitals other than marine hospitals, and I should be glad if the gentleman can tell me the law for that. It is an entirely different thing from exercising a discretion in some particular case, like the case at Cincinnati, where the hospital, by virtue of its locality and its being surrounded by other buildings, had become unsuitable for the purposes originally intended, and which has been closed, and a wholesale programme like this proposed one. That is an entirely different exercise of a power from that which undertakes to say, "I do not like the system of marine hospitals and therefore I will close two-thirds of them and substitute my system and my theory for caring for the sailors of the country in place of the theory of Congress."

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will permit me, the present law authorizes the lease or sale of marine hospitals in certain cases; but is there any present law authorizing the Department to keep a hospital as a hospital, but to keep it closed?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no law that I know of, and the intention of the Secretary was to close fourteen of these hospitals, and put watchmen there simply to guard the vacant property. Now, in the very last sundry civil bill passed by this House there were provisions providing for expenses at marine hospitals, showing that it was still the policy of the Government to carry on these hospitals and to have the seamen cared for there.

There was authorized by Congress the building of a marine hospital at Pittsburg, and the work on that hospital has been delayed, and is now stopped, because the Secretary of the Treasury, in his judgment, considered that Congress was unwise in having appropriated for the building of such a hospital. If it be right that these hospitals should be done away with, if it be economical, then let the Secretary of the Treasury make his recommendation to Congress, and let the proper committee having that subject within its jurisdiction present a bill, that hearings may be had and that this Congress may express its will in a proper way.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky is so important that I shall have to insist upon a ruling on this question; for if, as he says, it is the purpose of the Department, in its discretion, acting under authority of law and in the interest of public economy, to close up the marine hospitals and to provide for the treatment of patients in local hospitals, and this amendment should be adopted, then of course the amendment of the gentleman would be a precedent which will be followed by the Representatives on this floor of every other marine hospital in the United States, and in that way the existing law will virtually be repealed.

The gentleman from Kentucky concedes that the Secretary of the Treasury has the authority, in his discretion, to close a marine hospital and sell the property belonging to the United States, and then he admits that it is his purpose to prevent the accomplishment of that, in the event that the Secretary sees fit to exercise his discretion in this particular case, referring to the marine hospital at Louisville, Ky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota that, in the first place, the amendment does not apply exclusively to the Louisville hospital. It applies to any marine hospital. In the second place, while the law provides for the lease or sale of a marine hospital under certain conditions, it nowhere provides for the closing of it and the retention of it without the purpose of either leasing or selling it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman to say, in the course of a conversation that I had with him, that it was his purpose to make this amendment apply exclusively to the Louisville Marine Hospital. I did not observe the reading of the gentleman's amendment, but if it applies universally to all hospitals, then, in my judgment, it would, to the extent to which it seeks to destroy the jurisdiction and power of the Secretary of the Treasury under existing law, be a change of existing law.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order, I desire simply to say that here is a provision appropriating $240,000, to which I offer as an amendment a proviso that says a certain part of that money shall not be expended in the event that some of the hospitals for which the appropriation is made are closed. In other words, it is purely a limitation upon the appropriation, and does not in any way change the law. If the Secretary of the Treasury desires to do so, he can close all of these hospitals; but if he closes them, the result of his action will be that he will not have the money to expend for their maintenance that he would have if they were kept open. It is simply a limitation upon the expenditure, and not a change of existing law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he thinks an amendment limiting the Secretary of the Treasury to the expenditure of only $230,000, for example, in case the hospital at Louisville, Ky., should be closed, would be a limitation? The Chair confesses to a great deal of doubt as to this amendment, and, although it is expressed in language more or less circuitous, it would seem to the Chair that the effect of it is such as indicated in the illustration which the Chair has just made.

Mr. TAWNEY. The conclusion of "the gentleman from Minnesota," in respect to the question of whether it was or was not in order, was based upon what the gentleman says the effect of his amendment is, rather than upon the language of the amendment he has offered.

Mr. SHERLEY. I submit to the Chair that my remarks are not before the Chair for his ruling, but that the amendment itself is.

Mr. TAWNEY. I submit that the Chair, in determining the point of order, may take into consideration the gentleman's declared purpose of the amendment, although that purpose may be, as the Chair has said, expressed in a rather circuitous manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Minnesota will excuse an interruption, what he has just said will not do, because we have very high authority for the fact that Congress itself every day is engaged in enacting what it thinks it thinks, while another Department of the Government is engaged in construing what Congress really did think.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not a question of difference of opinion between two Departments or between the legislative and an executive department. This is all occurring in this Chamber, or in one branch of the legislative department of the Government; and I submit that the Chair ought to take into consideration the declared purpose of the amendment when it is offered, to determine whether or not that amendment is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair sits as a judge in the case of a point of order—that is to say, theoretically.

Mr. SHERLEY. The only difference between this and any other amendment in the form of a limitation is that I have been a little more frank than most men are in offering such provisos to sections in a bill. Now, if the gentleman thinks my remarks make an otherwise proper amendment subject to a point of order, I will withdraw the remarks and still submit the amendment for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this proposition, it is simply this: The United States Government has a certain number of marine hospitals. This paragraph of the bill provides for a certain amount of money for the operation of these marine hospitals. Now, the gentleman's limitation is to the effect that if one of them is not operated the money that is here appropriated shall not be expended; that is to say, the proportionate amount of money that is here appropriated for the hospital shall not be taken out of the Treasury by the Secretary. It seems to me it is a clear limitation on the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. From a careful reading of the amendment itself the Chair is of the opinion that it expresses a mere limitation or a bar upon the expenditure of the amount carried in that paragraph, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Steam launch for Alaska: For the purchase or construction of a steam launch for use in the propagation of salmon in Alaska, $8,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I reserve the point of order. I see here a provision, which is new legislation, for a steam launch for Alaska—for the purchase or construction of a steam launch for use in the propagation of salmon in Alaska, $8,000. What is the reason for that appropriation? Have we got to the point where we have got to propagate salmon up in Alaska?

Mr. TAWNEY. We have not only got to that point, but we have been there for a long time. We have been propagating salmon in Alaska for a number of years. We have a fish hatchery, and we have just now provided in this bill for the employees necessary to maintain and operate the same. If the gentleman knows anything about southeastern Alaska——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, he does not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Where this hatchery is situated, he will know that the only means of transportation in that section of the district is by water, and it is impossible, in the operation of a fish hatchery there, to conduct it and operate it without a launch of some kind. In other words, I will say that it is a necessary incident to the maintenance and operation of the fish hatchery which has heretofore been constructed and is now in operation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order for the purpose of making a remark or two in connection with the work of the Commissioner of Fisheries. The Bureau of Fisheries is one of the most important and useful bureaus under the Government. The manner in which the business of this Bureau is carried on is perfectly admirable, so far as that is concerned; but I desire to call attention of the country to the fact that while we are propagating salmon in Alaska, and there are very many salmon in Alaska—the fisheries there are neither exhausted nor threatened with exhaustion—our fisheries in the interior waters here at home, the interior lakes and streams of the United States, are becoming exhausted.

A year or two ago I dropped a note to the Commissioner of Fisheries, asking that he restock a lot of lakes in the Yazoo, Mississippi, delta, a country of little river bayous and fresh-water lakes and lakelets. Now, those lakes used to be filled with the finest bream, goggle-eye, white perch, big and little mouth black bass, speckled perch, striped salmon, and other fish, which are now becoming fished out and exhausted. He wrote to me to say that while he would be glad to fill the request of individuals who wanted fish to put into those streams, he could not send large quantities for the purpose of restocking. Now, then, for anyone who is acquainted with the geography of that country, what I am about to say is familiar. Up about what is called "the Yazoo Pass," where the Mississippi River used to run down, there is an immense levee, which was broken through during the war by the soldiers of the Federal Army, so that the Federal gunboats went through, threatening Vicksburg in the rear. Since this levee has been built of course this Yazoo Pass is blocked up. It used to feed all of these innumerable lakes, some of them half a mile, some 10 miles, and some 20 miles in area, and also the headwaters of the Sunflower, the Tallahassee, the Yazoo, and all those infinite streams. The streams and lakes used to be interlaced. Now the connecting links are low and sometimes dried up. It seems to me that while we are devoting money to the propagation of salmon to keep the fisheries away up in Alaska from being exhausted, there ought to be some method whereby these interior streams of the United States could be restocked for the pleasure, profit, and feeding of the people. I understand that what I say about the Yazoo, Mississippi, delta is true also of the lake country of Minnesota and all the fresh-water lake sections—especially the lake country up about the headwaters of the Mississippi River itself.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question in this connection. A few years ago we passed a bill making a fish hatchery at Tupelo in order to supply those streams. How successful has that been?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is mistaken. The fish hatchery at Tupelo was not established for the purpose of supplying these streams. It was established for the same purpose that all fish hatcheries are, namely, hatching fish to be sent out; but when it comes to the manner of sending these fish out, John Jones is required to apply, and he gets just so many fish, and Billy Williams is required to apply and he gets just so many fish. Now, you can get three or four or five people living along one of these lakes to apply, and they will get each a certain very limited quantity of fish, which, however, is not a drop in the bucket in connection with the large area of the lake district I am talking about. What I am talking about is that there ought to be a different regulation in the Bureau whereby when a lake or a stream of public importance is becoming exhausted of its fish it could be restocked in a comparatively wholesale way instead of merely disseminating the fish around to individuals to put for the most part in private ponds. In other words, wherever the interior waters are public waters, and most of these lakes and bayous and streams are not only of public importance, but navigable, ought not to be held to a retail business insufficient to accomplish the aim of restocking them merely by sending a few fish to one individual, who would put them into the lake. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like simply to make the suggestion, to be shown by the record, that the present head of the Fish Commission has reduced the cost of production of fish in the hatcheries about one-half, so that with a small appropriation we can now furnish vastly more in quantity than heretofore. There is one very serious objection to furnishing large quantities of fish for streams that constitute a dividing line between States, because of the great difficulty of enforcing any fish laws on rivers that are the dividing line between two States where conflicting jurisdiction comes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the gentleman will excuse me, in this case I am talking about, of course the erection of this levee cuts off these streams from what they used to receive, to wit, the fish coming down annually from the headwaters of the Mississippi and Ohio, and these lakes are becoming exhausted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I fully agree with the gentleman, but I thought I would explain that under the present management we are largely increasing the production of fish and will be able to furnish more fish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am aware of that, and I am glad of it, and I have no criticism to make of the Commissioner. He seems to be not only courteous and nice in attending to his work, but his work seems to be very effective in every way except in this particular, and I wanted to express the hope—because I do not think there is any law or any ironclad regulation binding him to this course—that hereafter it will be varied from.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion act: To prevent unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto, and for expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expense of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation, $500,000, which shall be paid from the permanent appropriation for expenses of regulating immigration, and of said sum $1,000 per annum shall be paid to the Commissioner-General of Immigration as additional compensation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in line 17 I move to strike out the word "five" and insert "six."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 17, strike out "five" and insert "six;" so it will read "$600,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] called attention to the fact that the Chinese-exclusion act was not at present being enforced; that the Bureau of Immigration, at the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, had practically ceased to deport Chinese found to be unlawfully in the United States. The appropriation for this service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, was $600,000. The appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, is $600,000. It is true that the estimate for this year is but $500,000. The action of the committee in allowing that sum was based upon the statement made by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, in which he called attention to the fact that in the months commencing July, 1904, to February, 1905, the expenditures were much less than during the same months commencing July, 1905, and ending February, 1906. To illustrate: In February, 1905, $62,609.10 were expended in deporting Chinese found to be unlawfully in this country, while during the month of February, 1906, under directions of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor not to execute this law, but $28,683.12 were expended. To make clear just the situation, I wish to read a brief extract from the testimony before the committee. The Commissioner-General of Immigration said:

As you will see, February shows a good deal less expenditure in 1906 as compared with 1905, because we are returning few Chinese to China.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is, they are not violating the law as much as before?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; we were instructed not to make arrests of the Chinese found unlawfully in the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. The law is not enforced so rigidly?

Mr. SARGENT. We are not doing so active a business as we were a few months before.

Mr. SULLIVAN. From whom did you receive the instructions not to enforce the law?

Mr. SARGENT. I received the instructions from the head of my Department, the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor. He said that during this agitation about the boycott in China he thought it would be unwise to make the arrests as we had been previously doing of Chinamen found unlawfully in this country, and of course I always obey instructions. We were expected under the law to take into custody those who had been here unlawfully, and that was what I was doing.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was in hopes that the vigorous execution of the law had enforced a respect for it on the part of the Chinese themselves.

Mr. SARGENT. I think a vigorous enforcement of the law has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction to be created among those who have in times gone by made a good deal of money by the lax enforcement of the law. If you will note the appropriations, I do not know but that some of you gentlemen were on the committee when I said, some years ago, that if you wanted the laws enforced you should give me the money and we would enforce them.

And at that point, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that it is a matter of common rumor that those persons engaged in the illegal business of bringing Chinamen across the borders from Canada or Mexico——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a matter of common rumor, Mr.

Chairman, that those engaged in this illegal traffic have been able to make from $500 to $1,000 for every Chinaman that they successfully bring into the country in violation of the law. Naturally the persons engaged in this illegal traffic were dissatisfied with the rigid enforcement of the law. I know of no way at this time that Congress can express its desire that the law be rigidly enforced and that Chinamen found to be in this country unlawfully should be deported, except by increasing the appropriation for that service, so that those charged with the duty of enforcing the law will know that Congress desires to place at the disposal of the Department adequate means to enforce the law.

I am one of those who am opposed to the admission of Chinese into this country. I believe that the present law should be rigidly enforced. I believe that the Bureau of Immigration should apprehend and take proper proceedings to have deported those who come into the country illegally and in violation of the Chinese-exclusion law. I have no sympathy with the theory that members of the Cabinet or that the Administration can set aside the Chinese-exclusion laws in order that some person engaged in the business of exporting certain goods may find a more ready market for them in the Chinese Empire. I know no other way in which to have the House express its opinion at this time that the law should be rigidly enforced than to offer this amendment, giving ample means to the Department to carry out the provisions of the law, and to have continued the practice of deporting Chinamen here illegally, as was done up to February, 1905.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment increasing the appropriation for enforcing the Chinese-exclusion act from $500,000 to $600,000. In 1904 we appropriated $600,000 to enforce this Chinese-exclusion law. In 1905 we appropriated $600,000 again. Now Commissioner-General of Immigration Sargent says that last year they did not expend $600,000, and therefore this year they come and ask for only $500,000.

I remember that two or three years ago my friend, the gentleman from Georgia, Judge BARTLETT, offered an amendment here appropriating $250,000 to prosecute the trusts—a special fund. The gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, not satisfied with that, "raised" Judge BARTLETT at his own game by offering an amendment to Judge BARTLETT'S amendment, increasing the amount of the special fund to prosecute trusts to $500,000. Colonel HEPBURN'S amendment was received with great applause and went through with a whoop. We thought that we had surely furnished abundant ammunition to kill the trusts. It turned out at the end of that fiscal year that the Department of Justice had only expended—my recollection is—thirty-odd thousand dollars of that money; at any rate, only a small portion of the half million. During that time the land was as full of trusts as Egypt was of lice, frogs, or flies; and it is as full of trusts yet. If that $500,000 had been effectively expended by the Department of Justice in vigorous prosecutions, every trust in the land would have been killed dead as a smelt long before this.

The great body of the American people—particularly the laboring people—want these Chinese coolies kept out of here. It makes no difference how much it costs, and it makes no difference whom it makes mad. Congress did its duty by passing a good exclusion bill, and then supplemented that action by doing its duty by appropriating $600,000 a year for two years. It is the Executive branch of the Government that failed in its duty, according to the testimony of Mr. Commissioner Sargent himself, by not enforcing the law as it stands. That is the reason the last appropriation of $600,000 was not exhausted.

Somebody said not long ago that if every Chinaman would increase the length of his shirt tail by 2 inches, it would put up the price of American cotton to a dollar a pound. [Laughter.] Well, now, that is a very gorgeous prospect, but I take it that the Chinaman cuts the length of his shirt tail according to the length of his cloth and according to the length of himself. No matter what we do or say, he will not increase the length of his shirt till he gets more money.

We hear much talk about this Chinese boycott. Our trade with China is a mere bagatelle. Our exports to China only amount to 2½ per cent of our total exports; our imports from China only amount to 3½ per cent of our total imports; and the truth is that the Chinese do not buy from us because they love us; the English do not buy from us because they love us. A very great affection has been engendered in the last two or three years between us and England; it's so sudden, don't you know. Too sudden to last. But nobody buys our stuffs because they love us; they buy our stuffs because ours are better than anybody else's stuffs or because they are cheaper than anybody else's stuffs. [Applause.] Love and affection count for little or nothing in commerce. It is business pure and simple and nothing else. So long as we make better products than other people and sell them cheaper we will outsell other nations, but if other nations make better products or sell them cheaper they will outstrip us in the markets of the world. That's the whole case in a nutshell and all there is to it.

The truth about this boycott, as I understand it now, is that that celebrated and frisky diplomat, Wu Ting-fang, who before he went home committed enough infractions of the diplomatic proprieties in this country to have caused forty white diplomatists to receive their passports, when he went home, pretending to be a great friend of the American people, originated and engineered that boycott. He went around this country advising people what to eat and wear and how to behave; inquiring of women how many children they had and of husbands how many wives they had, poking his bill into American affairs generally. If he had been a white man he would have been ordered out of this country long before he went. Washington ordered Genet out of the country for committing not one tithe of the improprieties that that Chinaman did. Grover Cleveland sent Lord Sackville West out of here in a hurry for doing a thing that at the worst was a very slight impropriety.

Gentlemen say they simply want the educated Chinese classes to come over more freely. That's the theory as it is propounded; but the trouble about this entire Chinese question is that all Chinamen look alike to us, and you can not tell one from t'other or t'other from which.

[The time of Mr. CLARK of Missouri having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

They get the coolies in here in every sort of a way and by every sort of trick. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated that the persons interested in getting coolies in—that is, the Chinese Six Companies in San Francisco, and a good many up on the northern border, and a good many on the Mexican border—make a profit of from five hundred to one thousand dollars a head for every Chinaman they smuggle in. I read on the train to-day a piece in one of the Philadelphia papers, which I intended to cut out and keep to use here, not knowing that this question was coming up so soon, but I left the paper on the train. It gave an account of some place on the border where they had actually rigged up a tunnel to get the Chinese in here on the sly. It is a lucrative performance, and bad men work at it constantly and successfully. I agree with what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said a while ago, and I have heard the chairman of this committee [Mr. TAWNEY] make the same kind of an objection a dozen times to other things that this Government is drifting into a government of bureaus. Instead of Congress running the United States, a lot of bureaucrats are running it. We pass a law. What is the business of the executive department? I do not care a straw whether it is the President or a member of the Cabinet or some understrapper. The business of every one of them is to rigidly enforce and carry out the laws which we pass. The way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce it. Let us see what Mr. Sargent says. Here is an extract from the hearings before the Appropriations Committee, which I most heartily commend to all who favor government by Congress instead of government by bureaus:

Mr. SARGENT. We are not doing so active a business as we were a few months ago.

That is the reason this appropriation has not been consumed.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. From whom did you receive the instructions not to enforce the law?

Mr. SARGENT. I received the instructions from the head of my Department, the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor. He said that during this agitation about the boycott in China he thought it would be unwise to make the arrests, as we had been previously doing, of Chinamen found unlawfully in this country; and of course I always obey instructions. We were expected, under the law, to take into custody those who had been here unlawfully, and that was what I was doing.

"I always obey instructions," he says, and that is precisely what the rest of them ought to do—obey the instructions of Congress expressed by statute or by resolution—and the chairman of this committee, and his great committee—and I give them ample credit for it, all they are entitled to—have been fighting during this entire Congress, and as a matter of fact the fight was begun in the last one, to break up the practice of Government officials violating the laws which we pass. Yet here is a most flagrant case of the executive department failing to carry out the will of Congress by shirking its duty to the people. Certain Department officials appear to lie awake of nights studying the art of how to not do it. Some of them appear to think that the only proper function of Congress is to make appropriations to pay their salaries. Of course there are plenty of good and conscientious men among them who do their whole duty.

It was a matter of common rumor four or five months ago, when this boycott was first talked of, that there was danger of the present Secretary of Commerce and Labor being compelled to resign his position because he did not agree with the policy of the President touching these Chinese. Now, it turns out that after Congress solemnly passed a law—and that law was not passed in a corner either; it was passed after weeks of hearings before the House and Senate Committees on Foreign Affairs, and after a great debate in this House, and after a long tussle with the Senate conferees, who did not want any bill that would really exclude Chinamen, that is the truth about it—and after we got that law on the statute book, and after we appropriated the money to enforce it, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, according to the statement of Mr. Sargent, practically suspends a law passed by the American Congress and signed by the President of the United States. If this modus operandi is to be perpetuated we might as well resign and go home, and turn the whole thing over to the executive department, thereby saving to the taxpayers of the country the expense of maintaining the Congress. The sooner every Federal official in this country is taught the important lesson that when we pass any sort of a law it shall be enforced to the letter the better it will be for everybody, and the more effectively this Government will be run. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has commented upon the fact that we appropriated the sum of $500,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust laws. He has failed to call attention to the fact that after the lapse of three years only $120,000 of that $500,000 had been expended; in other words, that we appropriated twelve times as much as the average annual expenditure from the date of that appropriation to this hour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In a moment. Whether the gentleman meant thereby to advocate the policy of appropriating twelve times as much as could be utilized during the fiscal year, I was not clear, and therefore I cheerfully yield to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was it twelve times as much as could properly have been utilized?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose every trust in the United States had been prosecuted as it ought to have been, don't you think the entire appropriation would have been consumed?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman by saying that in my judgment it would not be possible in a single year to organize an adequate force and collect the evidence to prosecute all the so-called "trusts" in the United States. I think the money was wisely, carefully, and prudently expended, but as generously expended as could be done with good to the service.

Now, I understand this precedent of appropriating twelve times as much as the average amount that could be utilized on an average in the past three years is the precedent cited for the increase of this appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was a precedent cited to show how the executive officers failed to carry out the will of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if I misunderstood the effect of his precedent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You certainly did.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, let us turn to this item for the enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion law, and I want to call attention to the appropriations for this purpose in the years gone by. Never but twice since the first enactment of Chinese-exclusion laws have we given so much money as is proposed to be given this year for the enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion law. It is true that last year we gave $600,000, and the previous year the same. The year before that we gave $500,000, the year before that $288,000, the year before that $230,000, and the year before that $160,000. The proposed appropriation is, therefore, far and away in excess of the average appropriation for this purpose, and as great as any ever given, except in two years, and the greatest ever given outside of three years.

The proposed appropriation for next year is $50,000 more than was appropriated during the four years of the last Democratic Administration of President Cleveland.

Now, I want to correct a slight misapprehension as to the meaning of Mr. Sargent. We may classify this legislation as legislation for the exclusion of Chinese and legislation for the deportation of Chinese who are actually in the country. There has been no relaxation of the enforcement of the law for the exclusion of Chinese seeking to enter this country. The record does show that there has been some abatement of the efforts to scour the country and find individual Chinese who are here unlawfully and to deport them to China.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if that part of the law which looks to the deportation of Chinamen unlawfully here is not just as much law as that part of it which looks to the exclusion of Chinese from the country?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, it is just as much law; but I am simply making a statement of the truth, in order that there may be no misapprehension as to what has taken place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There has been a suspension of the law by Executive order.

[The time of Mr. SMITH of Iowa having expired, by unanimous consent, it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask a single direct question, ad hominem: Do you indorse the act of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in ordering Mr. Sargent to partially suspend this section of the law?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the Secretary of Commerce and Labor ordered Mr. Sargent to only partially enforce this law, I do not indorse it, but the evidence does not show that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does it show?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The reduction of a police force of a city is not an instruction not to enforce the law. It is true there is not that diligence being displayed in the searching out of individual Chinamen who are here, and discovering why they are here, that formerly characterized the service of the Immigration Bureau.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that Mr. Sargent did not say that they had ceased to be as diligent searching them out, but that they had ceased arresting those found here unlawfully.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think that Mr. Sargent's language will bear the interpretation that having discovered a specific individual who has here unlawfully that they failed to enforce the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What he says is, "During the agitation about the boycott in China, we thought it would be unwise to make the arrests as we had been previously doing of Chinamen found unlawfully in this country."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the testimony, but I do not think it bears the interpretation put upon it by the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He says "We were expected under the law to take into custody those who had been admitted unlawfully, but he stopped taking them into custody."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is what he said; that is why he asked for a smaller appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. What the gentleman from New York has read Mr. Sargent did say. Now, the expenses are only at about the rate of $300,000 a year, and the committee has given $200,000 more than will probably be expended, in order that there may be no charge laid at the door of Congress that we have not furnished an abundance of money to enforce this law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask if he had pursued these instructions that he received from his superior officer to the end he could have reduced the expenditure entirely except the officers' salaries.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No, no; there is no intimation that any relaxation of the exclusion of the Chinese seeking entry here has taken place whatever.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know that one of the most important parts of the exclusion of the Chinese in a broad sense is to harness up these fellows that get in surreptitiously and deport them?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not the master of English that the gentleman from Missouri is, yet I think there is a distinction between excluding a man and deporting a man.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is all in the exclusion law.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is all in the text of the exclusion law, but there are two different things provided for.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If he had carried out the instructions of his superior officer entirely, he could have reduced all of the expenses of that office except paying the salaries.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have answered that he could not, because there was no intimation that there was to be a relaxation of the exclusion features of the law. But I have nothing to do with that. This appropriation, as proposed by the committee, is $200,000 more than is now required per year. It furnishes the money for the very purpose asked for by the gentleman from New York. It is abundant for a rigid enforcement of the law in every detail and every line of it. It is $200,000 more than, in my judgment, will be spent. It is one of the largest appropriations ever made for this purpose by the Government, and to raise it another $100,000 is to idly swell the appropriations of this Congress without the slightest anticipation, in my judgment, upon the part even of my friend from New York, who offers the amendment, that the money will ever be spent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be now closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate upon the pending paragraph be now closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion, that the debate on the paragraph be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. There has been three speeches on this amendment, two in favor of the amendment and one against it on behalf of the committee. I think we ought to close debate at this time and vote on the question before the committee rises; that is, vote whether or not this appropriation should be increased from $500,000 to $600,000. The question is not whether the law has or has not been enforced, which is the question gentlemen desire to discuss, and for that reason I ask that the debate be now closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Minnesota refused to have more than one hour of general debate and assured the the House that upon every question in this bill upon which there was legitimate discussion we should have ample time to discuss it, and I appeal to him now that he should give a reasonable time—twenty minutes—to some gentlemen who wish to speak on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that debate be now closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment to that, and I insist upon the Chair putting it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, that debate be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, that debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on the pending paragraph be now closed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment to that proposition that all debate be closed in twenty minutes, and to that amendment the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] moves an amendment that all debate be closed in one hour. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, that all debate be closed in one hour.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 30, noes 78.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 83.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York that all debate be closed in twenty minutes.

The question was taken, and while it was being announced Mr. WILLIAMS demanded a division.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The commmittee again divided; and the tellers announced—ayes 34, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that debate be closed in five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The regular order!

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. And I make the point that the appeal is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. That it is a dilatory motion, and if an appeal were entertained on a dilatory motion there would be no end of appeals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But upon what ground does the Chair decide?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that all debate be now closed.

The question was taken; and before it was announced Mr. FITZGERALD demanded a division.

Mr. TAWNEY. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. All those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty are all that are necessary. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers announced—ayes 79, noes 25.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment to the paragraph offered by the gentleman from New York, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 33, noes 79.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. WILLIAMS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay to Henry John Wright, of England, for information furnished, which information led to the collection of $500 fine for importing aliens under contract from England in violation of the immigration acts, to be paid from the permanent appropriation for expenses of regulating immigration, $250.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted to—

Mr. GRAHAM, indefinitely, on account of important business.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8410. An act to authorize the Charleston Light and Water Company to construct and maintain a dam across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, in the State of South Carolina;

S. 5357. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River above the village of Monticello, Wright County, Minn.; and

S. 2418. An act to enable the Indians allotted lands in severalty within the boundaries of drainage district No. 1, in Richardson County, Nebr., to protect their lands from overflow, and for the segregation of such of said Indians from their tribal relations as may be expedient, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 239. An act relating to liability of common carriers in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees;

H. R. 18592. An act to empower the Secretary of War, under certain restrictions, to authorize the construction, extension, and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures on lands underlying harbor areas and navigable streams and bodies of waters in or surrounding Porto Rico and the islands adjacent thereto;

H. R. 13917. An act to remove the order of dismissal from the military record of Robert W. Liggett;

H. R. 14397. An act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907;

H. R. 4546. An act ceding to the city of Canon City, Colo., certain lands for park purposes;

H. R. 11543. An act to correct the military record of Benjamin F. Graham;

H. R. 15332. An act to incorporate the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution; and

H. R. 17576. An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. TAWNEY (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting copies of ordinances of the executive council of Porto Rico granting certain franchises—to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of the old custom-house in New York City—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for a property clerk in the office of Commissioner of Fisheries—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have stated in the Sixth Auditor's Office the salary accounts of former postmasters, named on annexed memorandum schedule, who served at post-offices in Texas in terms between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, and who applied to the Postmaster-General prior to January 1, 1887, for payment of increased salary under the act of March 3, 1883, such salary accounts to be stated upon the registered returns of each postmaster for each term of service specified on memorandum schedule hereto attached, and by the method and rule laid down by the Postmaster-General for the statement and payment of salary accounts of former postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, in his public order of February 16, 1884, directing payment of salaries by commissions and box rents, less the salaries paid at time of service; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury the better to comply with this resolution, the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to turn over to the Sixth Auditor all the data now in his hands pertaining to each and every such claim specified on the memorandum schedule hereto attached; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate such stated salary accounts of former postmasters as soon as they can be made ready.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am directed to ask that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] be assigned to the vacancy on the minority side of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, in place of the late Senator from Maryland, Mr. Gorman.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Commitee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 5504. An act for the relief of Jesse Elliott; and

H. R. 14928. An act for the relief of F. V. Walker.

MICHAEL REYNOLDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2294) granting a pension to Michael Reynolds; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID M'CREDIE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4373) granting an increase of pension to David McCredie; which was, in line 7, after "Volunteers," to insert "Florida Indian war."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the District of Columbia appropriation bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he is not willing that we should complete the school bill before going on with the appropriation bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am quite willing that the Senator should complete it when we get the appropriation bill through, which I hope will be very soon. I will help the Senator then to get up the school bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the District of Columbia appropriation bill is before the Senate.

YOSEMITE VALLEY GRANT AND MARIPOSA BIG TREE GROVE.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask my friend from New Hampshire to yield to me for the purpose of requesting the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 118.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand that is an urgent matter, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and including the same, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park, and changing the boundaries thereof.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask that the regular order be proceeded with.

Mr. PERKINS. Notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from South Dakota I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, for the reason that the legislature of California is now in session and it is very important that the joint resolution shall be passed at this time.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I still call for the regular order.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from New Hampshire has yielded to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota demands the regular order, which is the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Secretary proceed with the reading of the appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, have I not the right under the rule to move that notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from South Dakota the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. PERKINS. That is my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to unanimous consent, and the Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the motion will prevail, for the reason that there is no possible objection to the joint resolution that I can conceive of. The legislature of California has unanimously passed a joint resolution receding——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. KITTREDGE. The joint resolution may lead to some debate. It was considered at quite considerable length before the Committee on Forest Reservations, and I think it should not be pressed this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. But the Senate has voted to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I understand that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not before the Senate by unanimous consent. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I wish to explain briefly

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called "free alcohol bill;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report thereon. I give notice that I shall try to get the bill up the first thing on Monday morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLLIVER, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5469) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to investigate and report upon the industrial, social, moral, educational, and physical condition of woman and child workers in the United States; and

A bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon.

Mr. KNOX, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18330) transferring the county of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, from the northern judicial district of Iowa to the southern judicial district of Iowa, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13543) for the protection and regulation of the fisheries of Alaska, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GEARIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 19255) granting an increase of pension to John Bradford; and

A bill (H. R. 14930) granting a pension to Mary Whisler.

CROW WING RIVER DAM, MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17881) permitting the building of a dam across the Crow Wing River between the counties of Morrison and Cass, State of Minnesota, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MALLORY introduced a bill (S. 6414) granting a pension to Daniel Cannon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DICK introduced a bill (S. 6415) granting an increase of pension to Henry M. McMachan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 6416) for the relief of certain officers of the Signal Service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KNOX introduced a bill (S. 6417) to amend "An act to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, and so forth, under the act of June 13, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1902; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 6418) to establish an additional recording district in Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for designs for a memorial in the Vicksburg National Military Park, commemorating the services of the Union Navy in the western waters during the civil war, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WETMORE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $225,000 for constructing a steam revenue cutter to be stationed at Newport, R. I., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment proposing to amend section 4 of the act approved April 26, 1906, relative to the reexamination of the enrollment records of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have stated in the Sixth Auditor's Office the salary accounts of former postmasters, named on annexed memorandum schedule, who served at post-offices in Texas in terms between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, and who applied to the Postmaster-General prior to January 1, 1887, for payment of increased salary under the act of March 3, 1883, such salary accounts to be stated upon the registered returns of each postmaster for each term of service specified on memorandum schedule hereto attached, and by the method and rule laid down by the Postmaster-General for the statement and payment of salary accounts of former postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, in his public order of February 16, 1884, directing payment of salaries by commissions and box rents, less the salaries paid at time of service; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury the better to comply with this resolution, the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to turn over to the Sixth Auditor all the data now in his hands pertaining to each and every such claim specified on the memorandum schedule hereto attached; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate such stated salary accounts of former postmasters as soon as they can be made ready.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am directed to ask that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] be assigned to the vacancy on the minority side of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, in place of the late Senator from Maryland, Mr. Gorman.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Commitee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 5504. An act for the relief of Jesse Elliott; and

H. R. 14928. An act for the relief of F. V. Walker.

MICHAEL REYNOLDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2294) granting a pension to Michael Reynolds; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID M'CREDIE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4375) granting an increase of pension to David McCredie; which was, in line 7, after "Volunteers," to insert "Florida Indian war."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the District of Columbia appropriation bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he is not willing that we should complete the school bill before going on with the appropriation bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am quite willing that the Senator should complete it when we get the appropriation bill through, which I hope will be very soon. I will help the Senator then to get up the school bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the District of Columbia appropriation bill is before the Senate.

YOSEMITE VALLEY GRANT AND MARIPOSA BIG TREE GROVE.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask my friend from New Hampshire to yield to me for the purpose of requesting the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 118.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand that is an urgent matter, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and including the same, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park, and changing the boundaries thereof.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask that the regular order be proceeded with.

Mr. PERKINS. Notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from South Dakota I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, for the reason that the legislature of California is now in session and it is very important that the joint resolution shall be passed at this time.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I still call for the regular order.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from New Hampshire has yielded to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota demands the regular order, which is the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Secretary proceed with the reading of the appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, have I not the right under the rule to move that notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from South Dakota the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. PERKINS. That is my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to unanimous consent, and the Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the motion will prevail, for the reason that there is no possible objection to the joint resolution that I can conceive of. The legislature of California has unanimously passed a joint resolution receding——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. KITTREDGE. The joint resolution may lead to some debate. It was considered at quite considerable length before the Committee on Forest Reservations, and I think it should not be pressed this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. But the Senate has voted to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I understand that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not before the Senate by unanimous consent. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I wish to explain briefly

what the joint resolution is. It passed the House some time since unanimously. It has been considered in the Senate committee for several months. The Secretary of the Interior, as it appears from the report, has strongly recommended the passage of the joint resolution. There is but one person to my knowledge in the country who has been opposed to the acceptance of this recession from the State of California.

Briefly stated, Mr. President, in 1864 the General Government ceded to California in trust for recreation and pleasure what is known as the Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove. The Yosemite Valley embraces an area of 56 square miles. The Mariposa Big Tree Grove consists of 2,560 acres, and contains the largest trees and the most ancient living things on the globe, the Sequoia gigantea—trees which are said to be from six to seven thousand years old. The Yosemite Valley is a cleft or gorge in the crest of the Sierra Mountains. It comprises, as I said, 56 square miles.

The State of California during forty years have had possession and have administered the trust the best they could. They have expended $496,000 during the past forty years for the care and management of the Yosemite Valley. They would have continued to administer this trust to the best of their ability, but in 1890 Congress in its wisdom saw proper——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the indulgence of the Senator from California. The Senator appealed to me to allow him to ask for the consideration of the joint resolution, and I agreed to do so, with the stipulation that it would not lead to debate. I regret that the Senator moved to take it up. He has displaced a very important appropriation bill, which it is very necessary should be passed at an early day, because the appropriation bill is going to take a good while in conference. I hope that the debate on the joint resolution will be as brief as possible.

Mr. PERKINS. I shall detain the Senate but three minutes. There is no possible objection to the joint resolution that my colleagues in either House of Congress can conceive of. It is very important, I will say to my friend from New Hampshire, because the legislature of California has been convened in extra session, and if Congress is not going to accept the act of recession that has been passed by the legislature of California, some other provision must be made.

The legislature, by an almost unanimous vote, passed a resolution granting this concession to the General Government. Every commercial organization in our State is in favor of it. The Sierra Club, composed of naturalists and scientists, of which Prof. John Muir is the president, wired me a few days since that it would be a great misfortune to the country if this joint resolution should not be passed.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask the Senator from California how much he is asking from the Government at this session of Congress in the way of an appropriation to carry out the purposes of the recession?

Mr. PERKINS. We are not asking one single dollar at this session of Congress. The Secretary of the Interior states that he has sufficient funds for all purposes for the present year.

But, Mr. President, be that as it may, it is one of the great natural wonders of the world. California would have continued to retain it and to administer its affairs, but, as I was proceeding to say, in 1890 Congress passed an act setting aside 1,000 square miles surrounding the Yosemite Valley as a national park. The result is that there is to-day a conflict there—a dual jurisdiction. Only last year a fire occurred in the Yosemite Valley, on the boundary line of that national park. The guardian of the valley, appointed by the State, said that it belonged to the General Government; that it was in the national park. The captain commanding the soldiers said, "No; it is in the Yosemite Valley." The result was that the fire got such headway before they jointly took hold of it that thousands of trees were destroyed.

Mr. President, as I said before, the Members of the House, the joint California delegation in Congress, the legislature of California, and every Californian I know of is in favor of the proposed recession to the General Government.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask the Senator from California if it is not a fact that $180,000 has been suggested as the amount that it will be necessary to appropriate for the benefit of this recession?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I gave the answer that the Secretary of the Interior gave to me, and if the Senator is not satisfied with it I will ask for the reading of the report. But I believe the Senate understands the measure, and, there being a unanimous demand for it, I ask to have it passed.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, I feel that I would not be doing justice to the pending resolution if I failed to present to the Senate a document sent to the chairman and members of the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game of the United States Senate. I send it to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, April 10, 1906.

To the honorable chairman and members of the Committee on Forestry, United States Senate.

DEAR SIRS: There is pending before your committee, House joint resolution No. 118, entitled, "Joint resolution accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley," etc.

Attached hereto is a copy of the act of the legislature of the State of California offering to recede and regrant the Yosemite Valley unto the United States of America.

Apart from the objections to the recession of Yosemite Valley that have hitherto been urged, based upon practical reasons as well as upon sentimental grounds, are some objections to the legal conditions that will surely result from the acceptance of the regrant of Yosemite Valley according to the terms of the act of the State legislature.

It will be assumed, as conceded, that the regrant must be accepted according to the terms of the act of the State legislature or not at all. In this connection attention is drawn to the fact that the grant is without any reservations whatsoever, nor is it coupled with any conditions except such as are set forth in section 3 of the act, namely, that the premises shall be "held for all time by the United States of America for public use, resort, and recreation, and imposing upon the United States of America the cost of maintaining the same as a national park."

In this respect this cession of territory differs from every other cession of territory made by a State to the General Government of which we have any record. Invariably in the past, when States have ceded to the General Government any part of their lands there is a reservation in the legislative act of the right to serve civil or criminal process within the lands ceded in suits or prosecutions for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed in the State, but outside of the cession or reservation.

A number of cases of cession of State territory to the General Government are collated in the case of Fort Leavenworth Railroad Company v. Lowe (114 U. S., 925), and are there commented upon in the learned opinion of Mr. Justice Field.

The language of the act of the Kansas legislature ceding the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation to the United States can be found at page 95 of the laws of Kansas, 1875, as well also at page 528 of 114 U. S. in the case referred to.

Justice Field, in commenting upon the reservation to the State of the right to serve civil or criminal process within the ceded territory, stated:

"The reservation which has usually accompanied the consent of the States that civil and criminal process of the State courts may be served in the places purchased is not considered as interfering in any respect with the supremacy of the United States over them, but is admitted to prevent them from becoming an asylum for fugitives from justice." (114 U. S., 533.)

The learned justice then proceeds to quote from various similar cases, incorporating in his opinion the language of the preceding cases by way of illustrating the meaning, as well as the reason, for such a reservation of State authority. Quoting from United States v. Cornell (2 Mason, 60), and commenting upon the reservation of the right of service of civil and criminal process, it is held:

"In its terms it certainly does not contain any reservation of concurrent jurisdiction or legislation. It provides only that civil and criminal process issued under the authority of the State, which must, of course, be for acts done within and cognizable by the State, may be executed within the ceded lands, notwithstanding the cession. Not a word is said from which we can infer that it was intended that the State should have a right to punish for acts done within the ceded lands. The whole apparent object is answered by considering the clause as meant to prevent these lands from becoming a sanctuary for fugitives from justice for acts done within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the State. Now, there is nothing incompatible with the exclusive sovereignty or jurisdiction of one State that it should permit another State in such cases to execute its process within its limits. And a cession of exclusive jurisdiction may well be made with a reservation of a right of this nature, which then operates only as a condition annexed to the cession and as an agreement of the new sovereign to permit its free exercise as quoad hoc his own process. This is the light in which clauses of this nature (which are very frequent in grants made by the States to the United States) have been received by this court on various occasions on which the subject has been heretofore brought before it for consideration, and it is the same light in which it has also been received by a very learned State court."

Again, commenting upon the case of Commonwealth v. Clary (8 Mass., 72), the opinion quotes as follows:

"The assent of the Commonwealth to the purchase of this territory by the United States had this condition annexed to it, that civil and criminal process might be served therein by the officers of the Commonwealth. This condition was made with a view to prevent the territory from becoming a sanctuary for debtors and criminals; and from the subsequent assent of the United States to the said condition, evidenced by their making the purchase, it results that the officers of the Commonwealth, in executing such process, act under the authority of the United States. No offenses committed within that Territory are committed against the laws of this Commonwealth, nor can such offenses be punishable by the courts of the Commonwealth, unless the Congress of the United States should give to said courts jurisdiction thereof."

Again the learned Justice refers to the opinion of the Attorney-General in the Harpers Ferry case, and repeats the same apparently with approval, namely, "that the sole object and effort of the reservation was to prevent the place from becoming a sanctuary for fugitives from justice, for acts done within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the State." (See p. 537.)

In 1854 the State of California ceded to the General Government political jurisdiction over Mare Island, but the State retained the right to serve process in the territory thus ceded. (See California Statutes, 1854.) And besides the case of the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation, above referred to, similar reservations were made in the legislative acts ceding to the General Government Fort Riley, Mo.; Brooklyn Navy-Yard, in New York; Fort Dearborn, Ill.; Harpers Ferry, Va.; National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Ohio; Charlestown Navy-Yard, Mass.; Fort Adams, R. I.; Fort Porter Military Reservation, N. Y., and others hardly necessary to mention.

In each one of these cases the question of sovereignty over the territory ceded has been before the courts, and it has been uniformly held that the retention by the State of political sovereignty over the territory ceded and the right to serve within the ceded territory criminal or civil process issued by authority of law, had the effect "to prevent the places from becoming a sanctuary for fugitives from justice for acts done by them within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the State."

It is easy to contemplate, therefore, in the light of these authorities, the deplorable result surely to flow from an acceptance of this regrant in its present form.

Other objections have been raised on both legal and sentimental grounds to the acceptance of this regrant, but perhaps no better exposition of them has ever been made than by the Hon. John B. Curtin, State senator, in his speech before the State senate of California on January 25, 1905. A copy of this speech is attached hereto, and a careful reading of the same is urged, to the end that an intelligent understanding of the entire situation might be arrived at by the gentlemen of your honorable committee.

We beg leave to remain, very respectfully, yours,

W. H. METSON.
C. S. GIDENS.

An act to recede and regrant unto the United States of America the "Yosemite Valley" and the land embracing the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove."

The people of the State of California, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. The State of California does hereby recede and regrant unto the United States of America the "cleft" or "gorge" in the granite peak of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, situated in the county of Mariposa, State of California, and the headwaters of the Merced River, and known as the "Yosemite Valley," with its branches or spurs, granted unto the State of California in trust for public use, resort, and recreation by the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite Valley and of the land embracing the 'Mariposa Big Tree Grove,'" approved June 30, 1864; and the State of California does hereby relinquish unto the United States of America and resign the trusts created and granted by the said act of Congress.

SEC. 2. The State of California does hereby recede and regrant unto the United States of America the tracts embracing what is known as the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove," granted unto the State of California in trust for public use, resort, and recreation by the act of Congress referred to in section 1 of this act; and the State of California does hereby relinquish unto the United States of America and resign the trusts created and granted by the said act of Congress.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect from and after acceptance by the United States of America of the recessions and regrants herein made, thereby forever releasing the State of California from further cost of maintaining the said premises, the same to be held for all time by the United States of America for public use, resort, and recreation, and imposing on the United States of America the cost of maintaining the same as a national park: Provided, however, That the recession and regrant hereby made shall not affect vested rights and interests of third persons.

Approved March 3, 1905.

Mr. PERKINS. As against the paper which has been read, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the report of the committee, which contains the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior that the joint resolution pass. I do not ask that it be read at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be inserted in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 3623, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 118) accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and making the same, with certain fractional townships, a part of the Yosemite National Park, have carefully considered the same and herewith submit their report:

The Yosemite Valley, as is well known, is one of the greatest wonders of the world, second only to which are the giant trees of the Mariposa and Calaveras big tree groves. California early recognized the importance of taking these two beautiful regions under public protection in order that they might be preserved intact for the enjoyment of all lovers of grandeur in nature. At that time the National Government had not established the policy of creating national parks, and as the civil war was then at its height it was not thought best to urge Congress to take action in the matter, other than to relinquish its claims upon the Yosemite Valley to the State of California, which was willing to bear the expense of caring for the reserve and keep it open for the use of the people. A bill introduced by Senator Conness, making the transfer to the State of California, was passed by Congress, and was approved by the President April 30, 1864. This grant by the National Government was upon the express provision that the tract conveyed should be held for "public use, resort, and recreation," and should be inalienable for all time, and that the reservation should be managed by the governor of the State, with eight other commissioners to be appointed by him, to serve without salary.

Section 2 of the same act transferred to the State of California the Mariposa Big Tree Grove upon the same stipulation and provisions that govern the Yosemite Valley. The Yosemite Valley grant comprises the whole of the valley proper, and extends back from the brink of the precipice an average distance of 1 mile, the total area within the boundaries thus fixed being 56 square miles. The Mariposa Big Tree Grove grant comprised only 2,560 acres.

September 28, 1864, Governor F. F. Low issued a proclamation reciting the act of Congress making the grants, appointed eight commissioners, and the board thus formed formally took possession of the tracts, and the State legislature accepted the trust by an act approved April 2, 1866. By the enactment of these laws the State of California became vested as trustee for the people with the "cleft or gorge" known as the "Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove."

Since that time the commissioners chosen by the different governors to supervise the management of the valley and grove have been selected from among the best citizens of California, and have invariably been men of culture, refinement, and education. With the limited appropriations made by the State legislature, the commissioners have done all that lay in their power to improve the conditions, build roads, trails, and approaches, and to provide facilities for the entertainment of tourists, the number of whom has increased steadily from year to year. The appropriations by the State of California for the care and management of the Yosemite Valley since its cession to the State have aggregated $495,622, including traveling expenses, salary of the guardian, and $60,000 appropriated to pay claims of so-called "squatters." Of this sum $40,000 was expended in the erection of a hotel for tourists and $25,000 for an electric-light plant. All the money expended was, of necessity, within the boundaries of the grant, leaving the approaches by road or trail in the hands of private transportation companies.

The consequence has been that the roads and trails leading to the valley have not been of the best, while travel over them has been made expensive. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, however, the number of visitors has increased yearly. In 1864 there were only 147 visitors to the valley, but in 1903 there were 8,376, and in the latter year so great was the travel to the valley that the commissioners were compelled to notify transportation companies at the height of the season to book no more tourists, as the limits of accommodation had been reached and hotels, camps, and tents were filled to overflowing.

The status of the Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, surrounded as they are by forest-reserve lands, is such that it has been impossible to develop the scenic resources of the region and make them as accessible to the public as could be wished. It has been demonstrated that the words of President Roosevelt regarding the Yellowstone Park apply with equal force to the Yosemite Valley. In regard to the former he says:

"The only way the people as a whole can secure to themselves and their children the enjoyment in perpetuity of what the Yellowstone Park has to give is by assuming the ownership in the name of the nation and by jealously safeguarding the scenery, the forests, and the creatures."

As long as the Yosemite Valley occupies its present relation to the surrounding national-park lands, there will be obstacles in the way of uniform protection and development which will prevent it from becoming a great national resort such as the Yellowstone Park has become, and it was with a view of placing it in a position where it could be brought under proper supervision and control that the California legislature has passed an act receding the valley and the grove to the United States. Had the Yosemite Valley grant not been in existence at the time the Yosemite National Park was established, a proposition to set apart under State jurisdiction a tract in the very heart of the park area would not have been entertained for an instant. But it is now possible to bring about a normal relation between the two areas by accepting the recession authorized by the State of California.

The recession of the Yosemite Valley to the Government is favored by the President, who, in an article published in July, 1904, says:

"As to the Yosemite Valley, if the people of California desire it, as many of them certainly do, it should also be taken by the National Government to be kept as a national park."

And in a message to Congress he makes the unqualified statement that "the national-park system should include the Yosemite and as many as possible of the groves of giant trees in California."

The boundaries of the Yosemite National Park, as fixed by the act of February 7, 1905, included within the area of the park a strip of land in the southwest corner which is one of the very few available routes for a trolley line to the valley, and in order to open this route to construction it will be necessary to exclude it from the park and add it to the forest-reserve area. The area eliminated from the park and added to the forest reserve aggregates 10,480 acres, of which 2,640 are patented.

In order to make this available, certain changes of boundary are provided for in the resolution, as is more fully set forth in the report of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives, which is herewith made a part of this report.

The acceptance of the recession of the Yosemite Valley is clearly in the public interest, and your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the resolution.

[House Report No. 2339, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. No. 118) accepting the recession of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and for other purposes, have had the same under consideration and report thereon with a recommendation that the same be adopted.

In 1864 Congress granted to the State of California the land commonly known as the "Yosemite Valley" and the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove" in trust for public use, resort, and recreation. In 1890 Congress created the "Yosemite National Park," embracing over 1,000 square miles and entirely surrounding "Yosemite Valley," which contains but 56 square miles. This creation of an "imperium in imperio" produced such a conflict of authority in matters of road building, policing, etc., that in 1905 the State of California receded to the United States the two parcels of land above named by an act of the legislature, as follows:

"SECTION 1. The State of California does hereby recede and regrant unto the United States of America the 'cleft' or 'gorge' in the granite peak of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, situated in the county of Mariposa, State of California, and the headwaters of the Merced River, and known as the 'Yosemite Valley,' with its branches or spurs, granted unto the State of California in trust for public use, resort, and recreation by the act of Congress entitled 'An act authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite Valley and of the land embracing the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove,"' approved June 30, 1864; and the State of California does hereby relinquish unto the United States of America and resign the trusts created and granted by the said act of Congress.

"SEC. 2. The State of California does hereby recede and regrant unto the United States of America the tracts embracing what is known as the 'Mariposa Big Tree Grove,' granted unto the State of California in trust for public use, resort, and recreation by the act of Congress referred to in section 1 of this act; and the State of California does hereby relinquish unto the United States of America and resign the trusts created and granted by said act of Congress.

"SEC. 3. This act shall take effect from and after acceptance by the United States of America of the recessions and regrants herein made." * * *

This resolution is to accept the recession tendered by the State of California. It also withdraws from entry part of two sections of land in order to square out the boundaries at one point.

The resolution also makes a slight change in the boundary of Yosemite National Park, the purpose of which is explained in the following letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 13, 1906.

SIR: Your letter has been received, inclosing, for such explanations and suggestions as may be deemed advisable, House joint resolution No. 116, entitled "Joint resolution accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and including the same, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park, and changing the boundaries thereof."

In response thereto I have the honor to state that in the last annual report of the operations of this Department a recommendation was made that Congress accept the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and that the same be included, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park; and joint resolutions (S. R. 14 and H. J. Res. 77) were introduced in Congress looking to the effectuation of the recommendation of the Department in the premises.

Subsequently a conference was held at the Department with the California delegation in relation to Senate joint resolution 14, at which it was suggested that the southwestern boundaries of the Yosemite National Park be changed so as to eliminate a portion and include the same in the Sierra Forest Reserve, to permit of the construction of an electric road through the same to enable the people of southern California to have ready access to the Yosemite Valley; furthermore, that the line of the proposed road through the tract of land to be eliminated would not mar the natural curiosities or wonders within the reservation, and its operation would result in the preservation of the fine groves of timber in the southern portion of the park rather than in their destruction.

In this view of the case, therefore, the Department prepared an amendment to Senate joint resolution 14, eliminating from the Yosemite National Park and including in the Sierra Forest Reserve 10,480 acres. Of these lands, 2,640 acres are patented, and of the latter, 1,880 acres are heavy sugar and yellow pine, fir, spruce, and cedar forests. In this amendment a paragraph was also inserted providing that in the grant of any right of way for railway purposes across the lands thus placed in the Sierra Forest Reserve it shall be stipulated that no logs or timber shall be hauled over the same without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

House joint resolution 116, on which you request a report, is substantially in accord with the legislation recommended in the report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1905, and the amendment thereof as submitted to Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, United States Senate, under date of February 26, 1906. On page 5, line 2, of the bill, however, there is one typographical error, to wit, the fifth word in said line reads "lands," whereas it should read "acts."

If the resolution is amended in accordance with this suggestion, it is recommended that the measure receive favorable consideration and be enacted into law at the earliest practicable date.

In this connection it is proper to add that the Department is advised that in House joint resolution 118, introduced by Mr. GILLETT of California, referred to on page 3780, No. 67, volume 40, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the error occurring in House joint resolution 116, above mentioned, is corrected.

Very respectfully,
E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

Hon. JOHN F. LACEY,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

APPENDIX A.

A statement concerning the proposed recession of Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove by the State of California to the United States.

[Prepared by the secretary of the Sierra Club under the direction of the board of directors, and adopted by said board as its official expression of opinion.]

The Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove were granted by Congress, in 1864, to the State in trust, "to be held for public use, resort, and recreation." Little was known of the valley at that time, and it was many years before it acquired a national reputation. At the present time it is world-famed, and is one of the valuable assets of the nation. Its loss or destruction would affect the entire United States, and every citizen of our country has a direct, vital concern in the welfare of the valley. In 1890 the much larger Yosemite National Park was created by Congress. This latter park includes in its very heart and surrounds on all sides the State park.

There has thus been created an imperium in imperio which has already given rise to much friction. This deplorable state of affairs was emphasized about a year ago, when a fire was permitted to burn some of the finest timber along both sides of the northern boundary of the State park. Both State and Federal officials insisted that the fire was outside of their respective jurisdictions. The Federal Government will always be hampered in its administration of the national park as long as the State park is under separate management. In order to reach the surrounding country, its guardians must pass through the State park, which is the natural base of operations for that whole surrounding region, and yet the Federal Government can maintain no permanent camp and base of supplies in Yosemite Valley because of the State control.

With these conditions existing, Congress is loath to make appropriations for the construction of extensive improvements, which would really result in the improvement of State property at national expense. As a result, all the roads entering the national and State parks are private toll roads, and tribute is levied on every visitor to this region. This condition of affairs is most unfortunate, and would have been remedied long ago but for the existing state of dual government.

But once reinvest the United States with authority over this heart and center of the national park, and headquarters will be established in the valley proper. A system of telephone lines will be constructed radiating from this natural center and extending to all portions of the territory embraced in the present State and national parks. This will insure an effective system of fire protection and will increase the efficiency of the patrol and policing of the park many times. We have assurance that this will be done by President Roosevelt himself, also from the Federal Commission recently appointed to investigate conditions there, and from various other Federal officials.

Maj. John Bigelow, jr., superintendent of Yosemite National Park, in his recent annual report, recommends:

First. The acquisition by the United States Government of Yosemite Valley, now owned by the State of California.

Second. The purchase of toll roads in the park leading to the valley.

Third. The purchase by the Government of certain patented lands, which are scattered over the park and constitute a considerable part of its area.

"The first of these measures," says Major Bigelow, "is believed to be necessary to secure from Congress an appropriation adequate to the improvement of roads and trails and of the park generally. It is a palpable anomaly for the valley to be under State government and the ground around it under the National Government. The valley would be rendered more attractive, and, therefore, financially more productive to the State, under National than it is under State government. The acquisition of the valley by the National Government is a matter, to be sure, in which the initiative must be taken by the State government, but I have good reasons to believe the idea that the National Government should own the valley has for some time been gaining in favor with the people of California."

2. The State is unable to properly care for Yosemite Valley.

Though the park has been under the control of the State for upward of forty years, yet even the main stage roads on the floor of the valley leading to the village are in a deplorable condition. The accommodations provided for visitors have been inadequate for years. In the summer of 1903 the State commissioners of the valley were, by reason of the congestion in accommodations provided for visitors, compelled to notify the various transportation companies not to allow any more tourists to enter the valley until the overcrowded conditions were relieved.

The State commissioners have done as well as could be expected. They receive no salary. All the time they give to the affairs of Yosemite Valley must be sacrificed from the time devoted to their regular vocations. Very few have had any previous experience which would specially fit them for the discharge of their peculiar and onerous duties. The paltry ten or fifteen thousand dollars annually at their disposal is entirely inadequate for the needs of the park. It is with difficulty that even this amount is "squeezed out" of the State treasury. The State commissioners are entitled to praise for what they have accomplished in the face of such adverse conditions.

3. In marked contrast to all this is the management of the Yellowstone National Park by the Federal Government.

The Yellowstone is in charge of Federal engineers and Army officers, who have received a life training to qualify them to perform their duties. They all receive salaries, and devote their entire time to the care and management of the park. During the three years 1901–1903 Congress appropriated nearly $700,000 for the care and maintenance of the Yellowstone. The best of skilled engineers are employed in the construction of the roads and trails of the Yellowstone, and they are kept in perfect repair. The roads are broad highways, with steel and concrete bridges.

The hotels of the Yellowstone are large, commodious establishments, first class in every respect, and with ample accommodation for its visitors.

4. State pride and sentiment is the strongest argument that has been advanced against this proposed change. But when analyzed it is found to be an entire misconception. If anything, sentiment should be all the other way. The Yosemite Valley is the property of the United States, and it has all along been the owner of the paramount title. It has, by Congressional act, allowed the State to take possession under a trust merely. To recede the valley only means to terminate the trust. The United States will not take the valley away nor close it up; but, on the contrary, will render it in every way more accessible and more enjoyable to visit, by reason of better accommodation for visitors. This sentimental argument savors too much of the "dog in the manger" policy to be considered seriously.

5. Our honored president, John Muir, who has devoted his life of activity to the best interests of our forests and natural scenery, has strongly advocated this proposed change for years. In a letter to the acting governor, written last July, he says:

"The Yosemite Valley, in the heart of the park, and essentially a part of it, should, I think, be ceded to the Federal Government and put under one management, thus insuring great improvement in present conditions through increased appropriations for roads, trails, and expert work on the valley floor, etc., thus increasing and facilitating travel, to the advantage of the entire country." (Sacramento Union, July 16, 1904.)

6. President Roosevelt favors the recession. In an article entitled "Wilderness Reserves," written for the Forest and Stream Publishing Company shortly after his western trip in 1903, reprinted in Forestry and Irrigation for July, 1904, he says:

"As to the Yosemite Valley, if the people of California desire it, as many of them certainly do, it should also be taken by the National Government to be kept as a national park."

And in his recent message to Congress he makes the unqualified statement that, "the national-park system should include the Yosemite and as many as possible of the groves of giant trees in California."

7. The Native Sons are strongly in favor of the recession. Grand President McNoble made this recommendation the strongest feature of his annual report.

8. A committee of the State board of trade reports that—

" * * * the board has been impressed by the arguments made by the Native Sons of the Golden West in favor of recession to the Federal Government, and the incorporation of the valley and Big Tree Grove with existing national park and forest reservations; also, that such recession will put an end to the inconvenience and risks of a divided jurisdiction now existing by reason of the State control of the valley and the Big Tree Grove, while each is surrounded by Federal reservations under the jurisdiction of the United States." (San Francisco Call, September 14, 1904.)

9. The board of directors of the Sierra Club, by unanimous vote, authorized the appointment of this committee to urge such action.

10. The California Water and Forest Association adopted the following resolution at its annual convention on December 2, 1904:

"Resolved, That the proposition to cede the Yosemite Valley back to the United States Government should receive the earnest consideration of the legislature, to the end that more commodious accommodations may be provided for making such valley accessible to the general public, and we recommend such transfer."

11. The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, that of Oakland, and other cities, and many other influential bodies have also favored the recession.

12. The various newspapers throughout the State have almost without exception indorsed the proposed change in editorial comment. Not one dissenting opinion has come to our notice. Since these comments outline some of the arguments to be given in favor of the proposed change, and since they voice in a degree the sentiment of the people on the question, extracts from a few of these expressions of opinion are given in the appendix hereto.

13. In conclusion, the past has demonstrated that the Yosemite Valley is of a national character, and every citizen of the United States is vitally interested in its welfare. The State assumed the burden of caring for it, and has expended its money for the benefit of every citizen of the United States. Forty years has proven that the State can not afford to appropriate out of the funds at its disposal a sufficient amount to adequately care for this national park. California has vital interests which concern her alone. She has forests to protect from fire; she has flood-water problems; she has a State Redwood Park; she has multitudinous interests which demand the expenditure of her own money. She can obtain no funds elsewhere for this work, for her citizens only are vitally affected by such expenditures. Her funds even now are far short of being adequate to meet the growing necessities of this great State. The Yosemite Valley requires the expenditure of at least $100,000 every year for its proper care and management. A hotel is absolutely required to be constructed in the valley at a cost of at least $200,000. The State can not afford to appropriate this amount.

But the United States is amply able to do this, and will, if given the opportunity. Therefore, the Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove should be receded to the United States, and thereby become a part of the national park, to which it naturally belongs. The result would be the improvement of the valley and national park by the construction of the best of roads, bridges, and trails. Ample hotel accommodations of the best quality would be provided. A telephone system for the entire park to guard against forests fires would be inaugurated. The patrol system of the national park would be rendered far more effective and the valley itself placed under the same system, so that perfect order would prevail, no matter how great the number of visitors. The toll-road system would be abolished, and in all probability a splendid boulevard constructed up the Merced Canyon, which would reduce the time and expense of travel one-half and greatly increase the comfort. This would attract immense numbers of tourists from all parts of the world who are now deterred by the arduous nature of the trip and the lack of accommodation.

Each of these tourists would not only learn something of our great State, but would spend money in it. Few of us even begin to dream of the wealth that will some day be poured into California by the multitude of travelers who will annually come to enjoy our unparalleled scenic attractions. We want to hasten that day, and we trust that the members of the State legislature will do their part in aiding to bring about this result by receding the Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Grove of Big Trees to the National Government.

Respectfully submitted.

APPENDIX B.

The Yosemite Valley is a wonder of nature of really national magnitude, and, like the Yellowstone Park, more fitly cared for by the nation than by any State. It also happens that the valley is actually inclosed within a much larger national park, and that conflicts of jurisdiction, involving serious results, have already occurred. The entire area of both parks constitutes one natural administrative unit, and it is believed that there is a growing feeling in Congress that such an arrangement should be made. (San Francisco Chronicle, Aug. 21, 1904.)

If the reports from the mountains last summer were true, there is danger in divided jurisdiction, for it was said that when the most destructive fire that ever visited the vicinity of the valley was raging, the State superintendent of the valley and the military superintendent of the park stood for days disputing whether the fire was on Federal or State territory, until it gained such headway that their combined forces could not master it until it had destroyed the fine forest extending from the Wawona road to Glacier Point. A single jurisdiction would render such a catastrophe from such a cause impossible. (San Francisco Call, Nov. 18, 1903.)

Major Chittenden, United States Army, chairman of the Federal commission appointed to investigate and report on matters pertaining to the Yosemite National Park, said that in case the valley was ceded to the United States, and that the Government would agree to assume the care and management of the valley, a fort would be erected in the valley and a system of permanent telephone stations established to give proper protection to the forests from fire. (San Francisco Examiner, July 16, 1904.)

It would be better for Yosemite if it were in the hands of the Federal Government. The Interior Department has control of the great Yosemite Reserve encircling the valley for miles in all directions, and could, without extra expense, supervise the valley as well. Yosemite Valley really belongs to the United States. It should be looked upon as a possession of all the people, and should be made more easily accessible to all. It should receive the attention that the Federal Government could give it. More money would be expended upon it, more care devoted to it, and the expenses of visitors should be greatly reduced. It would become what it should be—a people's park. (Oakland Enquirer, July 28, 1904.)

The failure of the State to provide for the proper accommodation of visitors to the valley has provoked a widespread demand that the reservation be receded to the Federal Government. Should the recession be made, there is no doubt that Congress would speedily provide the necessary accommodations as well as the other facilities to enable sight-seers to visit the valley and its surroundings under the most favorable conditions. The valley should be managed in the interest of the public to whom it belongs, and the convenience of the public should be the first consideration in making improvements. (Oakland Tribune, Sept. 14, 1904.)

State pride may prevent the legislature taking any such action, but there is no question that it ought to be done. The present system of divided jurisdiction paralyses all effort for the satisfactory administration of this greatest of natural wonders. Since it is out of the question for the nation to cede the park to the State, the State ought to cede the valley to the nation. (Fresno Republican, July 16, 1904.)

Under the absolute control of the United States Government the valley would have the best of care. Money for every needed improvement would be forthcoming. It would be carefully policed, and the chances for graft or political jobs would be reduced to a minimum. The citizens of California would enjoy every right in the valley that liberal but well-enforced regulations would permit. It would be "our" valley still. Uncle Sam could not run away with it, and he would certainly be a careful and at the same time indulgent guardian. The fact that the Government is willing to accept the trust is fortunate, and those who appreciate the situation will doubtless hope to see favorable action by the next legislature on Muir's proposal. (Stockton Record, July 12, 1904.)

Up to this time State management has been reasonably efficient, but in State hands the administration of the park must always more or less be involved in politics, whereas the Government would be able to administer it through the Army precisely as it administers the national park in the Yellowstone country. (Sacramento Union, April 22, 1902.)

There is a strong probability that the Yosemite Valley will be receded to the Federal Government by the State of California in the near future. Such a move would probably tend to a greater improvement of the park, as the expenses connected with keeping the great natural wonder open to the public are considerable and can be better sustained by Uncle Sam than the State of California. It would also tend to a quick abolition of toll roads, make a trip to the valley fraught with less expense to travelers and in the reach of almost everyone. (The New Era, Tuolumne, Cal., May 7, 1904.)

The only arguments that have been presented opposing the transfer are along the line of State pride. When this is analyzed, however, it does not appear justifiable. The park must necessarily remain forever in California, and the retention of title by the State means merely the inadequate continuance of a struggle to meet the obligations demanded by the magnitude of the situation and the traveling public. Public opinion largely favors the transfer. (Los Angeles Times, November 9, 1904.)

Yosemite is one of California's best assets. Every visitor it attracts from abroad is a source of profit to the people of this State, consequently the more sight-seers for the valley the more profit to Californians. The Government will do what the State has neglected to do, and do it better. (Oakland Tribune, November 26, 1904.)

"Whereas the Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove are among the scenic wonders of the world, and the pride, not only of California, but of the whole Union; and

"Whereas their proper maintenance and improvement imposes upon the people of California a burden which, in view of the fact that said valley and grove are national exhibits, should be borne by the National Government; and

"Whereas we believe that the National Government is alone able to undertake the expenditures necessary to properly improve said valley and grove by providing easy means of access, well-planned roads, trails, and other attractive features:

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Santa Barbara County hereby desires to go on record as favoring the recession to the National Government of the Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Grove, to the end that these natural wonders may receive the improvements which they deserve and the consequent attention from the world that they merit." (Santa Barbara Press, December 3, 1904.)

It is rumored that, moved by the admirable conduct and supervision of the Yosemite National Park, the State of California is likely, at the approaching session of the legislature, to recede to the United States the smaller Yosemite grant of 1864, which is in the park but not of it. It is absurd and wasteful that there should be two jurisdictions within one boundary, and the people of California are to be congratulated on the prospect of this wise consummation, which Congress should facilitate by a prompt acceptance of the duty of caring for the whole of the Yosemite wonderland. (Century Magazine, December, 1904.)

The superintendent of the Yosemite National Park recommends that the Federal Government "acquire" the Yosemite Valley, which it once gave to the State of California. It is to be hoped that this most desirable end may be accomplished at the coming session of the California legislature. The reasons for this course are abundant and conclusive. In the first place it is really, as its name implies, a "national" and not a State park. Its natural wonders are national in their magnitude, national in their interest, and national in the scale of expenditure required to make them accessible and protect them from impairment. They should be national, also, in their custody. This sentimental view would perhaps not be altogether conclusive were California rich enough to incur the expenditure involved in the ownership and protection of the park. Unfortunately this State is not rich enough, and practical considerations coincide with the sentimental in requiring that this wonderful valley be restored to the nation, which alone is able to care for it. From all sides come imperative demands for largely increased expenditures on the park, with which this State is positively unable to comply. For the next quarter of a century the State will be compelled to tax itself to the full limit of endurance for purposes essential to our material prosperity or for the fulfillment of moral obligations which must take precedence even of so noble an object as the Yosemite Valley. We have recently acquired a State park in the Big Basin of Santa Cruz County, and the forest fires of last summer admonished us that if we are to preserve that magnificent body of timber for the enjoyment of future generations we must incur heavy expense in protecting it from fire. The State, in fact, can not afford for the present to expend any more money on parks than it will be absolutely compelled to expend to prevent the destruction by fire of the forests of the Big Basin. The Federal Government should—and probably will, if desired—assume charge of the Yosemite Park as it has of the Yellowstone Park, and the legislation required for that purpose by our legislature should be enacted at the coming session. (San Francisco Chronicle, November 28, 1904.)

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN PENSACOLA, FLA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Secretary to turn to page 28 of the appropriation bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me to take up a bill of half a dozen lines. I do not think it will take five minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what the bill is, if he pleases.

Mr. MALLORY. It is a bill to relinquish the interest of the United States to certain land in the city of Pensacola, Fla.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it does not lead to debate I will yield, and then I shall insist on proceeding with the appropriation bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 360) to relinquish the interest of the United States in and to certain land in the city of Pensacola, Fla., to the Right Rev. Edwin P. Allen, Catholic bishop of the diocese of Mobile, Ala., in trust for the Catholic congregation of Pensacola, Fla.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, at the end of the bill, in line 11, after the word "Florida," to insert "and his successors;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the interest of the United States in and to the land in the city of Pensacola, in the State of Florida, known and described on the plat of said city of Pensacola as lots 1 and 2, between the squares and the lot on the east side of the Square of Ferdinand the Seventh, known as the "Catholic Church lot," is hereby relinquished and released to the Right Rev. Edwin P. Allen, Catholic bishop of the diocese of Mobile, Ala., trustee for the Catholic congregation of Pensacola, Fla., and his successors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to relinquish the interest of the United States in and to certain land in the city of Pensacola, Fla., to the Right Rev. Edwin P. Allen, Catholic bishop of the diocese of Mobile, Ala., and his successors, in trust for the Catholic congregation of Pensacola, Fla."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Secretary to go back to page 28 for a moment. I move to amend the amendment so that it will read:

Massachusetts avenue from Sheridan circle to S street, $6,900.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the total will have to be changed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The total will be changed to correspond.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, if the Secretary will turn to page 41, there is a committee amendment which was passed over. I ask that the date be made June 8. Let the Secretary read the amendment with this date filled in the blank.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, after line 7, the committee report to insert the following paragraph:

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 10, before the word "dollars," to insert "one hundred and forty-four;" so as to make the clause read:

In all, $17,144.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To correspond with the amendment heretofore made, the total will be changed to $264. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

For repairs and improvements to buildings and grounds, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, after line 14, to insert:

For a reserve pump and motor for the sewage-pumping plant of the Industrial Home School, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 2, to increase the appropriation for care and maintenance of children under a contract to be made with the Washington Hospital for Foundlings by the board of chafities from $5,000 to $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 5, to increase the appropriation for the care and maintenance of children under a contract to be made with St. Ann's Infant Asylum by the board of charities from $5,000 to $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Temporary Homes," on page 81, line 13, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred;" in line 14, before the word "cook," to insert "clerk, $720;" and in line 18, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred," and insert "four thousand four hundred and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For municipal lodging house and wood and stone yard, namely: For superintendent, $1,200; clerk, $720; cook, $360; and laborer, $360; maintenance, including rent, $1,780; in all, $4,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 21, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred;" in line 23, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seven" and insert "five;" and in line 24, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic, namely: For superintendent, $1,200; janitor, $360; and cook, $360; maintenance, $3,580; in all, $5,500, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and ex soldiers and sailors of the Spanish war shall also be admitted to the Home.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 10, after the word "provided," to strike out "in sections 4844 and 4850 of the Revised Statutes" and insert "by law;" so as to make the clause read:

Hospital for the Insane: For support of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane in said District, as provided by law, $272,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Militia of the District of Columbia," on page 83, line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "one thousand five;" so as to make the clause read:

For lockers, furniture, and gymnastic apparatus for armories, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For custodian in charge of United States property and storerooms, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "seventeen;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "and $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the sum appropriated for these objects for the fiscal year 1906 shall be available for expenses of rifle practice and matches and for repair of practice ships for that year;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of camps, instruction, practice marches, and practice cruises, $17,000; and $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the sum appropriated for these objects for the fiscal year 1906 shall be available for expenses of rifle practice and matches and for repair of practice ships for that year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, line 19, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For general incidental expenses of the service, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 19, to insert:

For building for use of the naval battalion, with the necessary lockers and other equipments, $6,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 22, to insert:

WATER METERS.

For the purchase, installation, and maintenance of water meters to be placed in such private residences as may be directed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; said meters at all times to remain the property of the District of Columbia; to be repaid from revenues of the water department at the rate of $20,000 per annum, beginning with the fiscal year to end June 30, 1908, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Water department," on page 86, line 14, to increase the number of clerks at $1,000 each in the revenue and inspection branch from two to three.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 6, to increase the total appropriation for the distribution branch of the water department from $84,666 to $85,666.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 23, before the word "trunk," to insert "service and;" and on page 89, line 5, after the word "appropriated," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid from the appropriation for the water department, District of Columbia, extension of the high-service system, to the Holly Manufacturing Company, of Buffalo, N. Y., the sum of $6,880, deducted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as a penalty under contract No. 3324, dated November 11, 1903, and supplemental contract No. 3324, dated February 24, 1905.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On line 8, page 90, section 2, at the end of the line, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 90, line 8, after the word "exceed," it is proposed to strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 93, after line 18, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 7. That until and including June 30, 1907, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to advance, on the requisition of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, made in the manner now prescribed by law, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary from time to time to meet the general expenses of said District, as authorized by Congress, and to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advances payable by the District of Columbia out of the taxes and revenues collected for the support of the government thereof: Provided, That all advances made under this act and under the acts of February 11, 1901, June 1, 1902, March 3, 1903, April 27, 1904, and March 3, 1905, not reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States on or before June 30, 1907, shall be reimbursed to said Treasury out of the revenues of the District of Columbia from time to time, within five years, beginning July 1, 1907, together with interest thereon at the rate of 2 per cent per annum until so reimbursed: Provided further, That the Auditor for the State and other Departments and the auditor of the District of Columbia shall each annually report the amount of such advances, stating the account for each fiscal year separately, and also the reimbursements made under this section, together with the balances remaining, if any, due to the United States: And provided further, That nothing contained herein shall be so construed as to require the United States to bear any part of the cost of street extensions, and all advances heretofore or hereafter made for this purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be repaid in full from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 94, line 24, of the committee amendment, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, page 94, line 24, before the word "street," it is proposed to insert "acquisition of land for;" so that it will read:

The cost of acquisition of land for street extensions, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 95, line 3, to change the number of the section from 7 to 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yesterday the provisions relating to public schools, on page 41, were stricken out. With those provisions went an amendment that the committee had proposed to the bill. This morning I moved to insert that amendment with an amendment. I simply mention this that the clerks may get the matter right. The amendment was in relation to two attendance officers, etc. It is now in the bill with an amendment inserting the date "June 8" in the blank. That is understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is understood.

Mr. NELSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 68, line 7, after the word "thousand."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, under the subheading "Justices of the peace," line 7, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

For six justices of the peace, at $2,500 each.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in reference to that amendment I desire to make an observation. The Code of Law of the District of Columbia provided that there should be ten justices of the peace, at a salary of $3,000 each. That salary was paid for, I think, about six months, when in an appropriation bill the salary was reduced to $2,000 each a year, which has been paid since that date—I think since June 30, 1902. Last year the number of justices was reduced from ten to six, and the salary was allowed to remain at $2,000. There is a very strong argument, I will suggest, in favor of giving an increase of salary to these six men, they doing the work now that ten men formerly did. They act as judges of the police court in the absence or disability of the judges of that court, and we have established a new court for juvenile offenders, and one of these justices will have to preside there in the event of the judge of that court being absent or incapacitated for service. So that I will not resist the amendment the Senator from Minnesota has offered. It will go to conference, and we will give the matter careful consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. In support of the amendment, I ask that the statement which I send to the desk may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 423, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Salaries paid justices of the peace in the District of Columbia.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

I. Under the code, providing for the appointment of justices of the peace, approved March 3, 1901, and amended January 31 and June 30, 1902, it is provided that each of said justices of the peace shall receive an annual salary of $3,000, and the further sum of $250 annually for rent, stationery, and other expenses, etc.

It will be seen that this amendment is asking that the salary as fixed by law be given to these justices of the peace. Six months after this law first went into effect, and for six months after the justices qualified, they were paid at the rate of $3,000 per annum; but subsequent appropriations only provided $2,000 instead of the $3,000.

II. Under the said code as amended the justices of the peace in and for the District of Columbia are given jurisdiction in all civil cases in which the amount involved, or claimed to be due, for debt or damage arising out of contracts, express or implied, or damages for wrongs or injuries to persons or property, does not exceed $300, including all proceedings by attachment or in replevin, where the amount claimed or the value of the property involved does not exceed said sum. * * * And said jurisdiction shall be exclusive when the amount claimed for debt or damage or the value of personal property claimed does not exceed $50, and concurrent with the supreme court of the District of Columbia when it exceeds $50.

All landlord and tenant proceedings are instituted in and determined by the justices of the peace courts in this District. It will be seen that the justices of the peace in and for the District of Columbia have to deal with about as many difficult and complex questions of law and practice as any of the justices sitting in the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The chief difference between the litigation that is carried on in the justice of the peace court and that of the supreme court of the District of Columbia is found in the amounts involved.

III. When the code was first adopted, ten justices of the peace were provided for this District, but under the amendment adopted June 30, 1902, it was provided that on and after January 1, 1906, there should be but six justices of the peace in and for this District.

It will therefore be seen that six justices of the peace are now performing the labor that ten performed originally under the code. While it might be argued that there were, perhaps, too many justices of the peace provided for under the code as originally adopted, yet it is now perfectly apparent that with the increasing litigation before the justice of the peace courts from year to year the six which now exist here are, indeed, overworked. The records of the justice of the peace courts show that each justice is disposing of more than 2,500 cases annually.

The amount of work entailed upon the justices in the matter of entering these suits, as the law requires they shall be entered, into a docket kept by him for such purpose; entering every step taken in the matter of issuing writs and of the returns made thereon; entering continuances; entering motion, etc., and so on, to final judgment and execution; in addition to that, entering appeals and making the proper certifications of the records from that court to the supreme court of the District of Columbia; entering the nonresident and appeal bonds given, as well as those in attachment and replevin suits; also issuing summons for witnesses and the returns made thereon, besides the time which is consumed in the hearing of the contested cases, which means more than 50 per cent of the number of suits filed before him, one-fourth of which represent damage and debt cases, where the same are contested, of necessity casts upon the justices of the peace in and for the District of Columbia a burden which no other judicial officer is called upon to bear in this District. Their hours cover from 9 to 4 o'clock each secular day, exclusive of legal holidays and Sundays.

In this connection I might add that under the law when a vacancy occurs in the police court in this District, or when one or both of the judges presiding in said court is absent on vacation or by reason of sickness, the supreme court of the District of Columbia designates one or more of the justices of the peace to preside in said police court during the temporary absence of such judge or judges. By reason of this fact there is an average of about two and one-half months each year in which the justices of the peace perform the duty of the judges in the police court without one cent of compensation therefor. The judges in the police court receive a salary of $3,000 a year, and their court lasts, upon an average, from 9.30 in the morning to about 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Surely, when it is found that the qualifications of the justices of the peace are equal to that of the judges in the police court, and when it is found that his work is equally as important as that of the judges in the police court, and also, when his duties are very much more arduous and his hours longer in the discharge of his official duties than those entailed upon the judges in the police court, there is no justice in paying the judge in the police court a single cent more than is paid to a justice of the peace. If quantity and quality of work are to be the basis for fixing the salary that should be paid, it is submitted that the justices of the peace should receive the full $3,000, as fixed by law; in other words, his statutory salary.

One other matter I might suggest here, that it is proposed in the present House bill 18198 to provide for the judge's salary in the recently created juvenile court for the District of Columbia. Heretofore the police court judges have been holding said juvenile court, and it has usually taken about two hours a day to dispose of the cases. In the light of the past it is not likely that the judge sitting in the juvenile court will be called upon to sit for more than three hours a day for some time to come. Notwithstanding these short hours and notwithstanding the fact that his knowledge of the law is in no wise superior to that of the justice of the peace, the present pending appropriation bill is providing a salary of $3,000 per annum for the judge in said juvenile court, and also providing a salary of $2,000 for a clerk, and a salary of $1,500 for a chief probation officer, and $900 for a probation officer, in all $7,400. In other words, the present pending appropriation bill provides for this court, which has few writs to issue and only one character of cases to deal with, in which the rights of property are not considered and where the duties of the officers in said court will, perhaps, not exceed three hours a day for several years to come in the actual discharge of official duties, more than one-half of the sum which it has provided for a half dozen different courts in this District, where the litigation in the matter of damage, debt, replevin, and attachment suits aggregated during the last year over $1,250,000.

I merely mention this to call attention to the lack of due consideration given to the merits of the justice of the peace claim. Surely this inequality ought not to exist. Each justice of the peace ought, as a matter of right, be given a clerk at a salary of not less than $50 per month. They ought to be also given an appropriation for office rent and office expenditures, in the way of dockets and other supplies, absolutely necessary for the business of the office, of not less than $50 per month. They can not get an office suitable for their business under at least $30 or $40 per month. Yet the present pending appropiation bill sets apart the meager little sum of $250 per annum to cover the whole of these expenses and then the little sum of $2,000 a year for their services. In other words, they have not even put them on the same footing that they have put the clerk in the juvenile court, for the reason that that clerk will not have to pay anything out of his salary for the expenses of his court, whereas the justices of the peace must, of necessity, as they have done in the last few years, pay out of his private pocket such moneys as are necessary over and above the $250 allowed to meet the expenses of his office.

It does not seem possible to me that Congress, when its attention is called to this situation, will tolerate it. It will be found that the Attorney-General, Mr. Moody, has written a letter in which he has advocated remedial legislation for the justices of the peace along these lines.

IV. I take it that the committee, or at least some members of the Committee on Appropriations, must have regarded justices of the peace in and for the District of Columbia in the same light that a justice of the peace is regarded in the States.

There not only their qualifications but their jurisdiction is exceedingly limited. The average justice of the peace in the States is not required to have an office and is permitted to follow the ordinary vocations or business in which he is engaged, and his duties as justice of the peace are merely side issues, which he disposes of at his leisure. His work is of such small consequence, to start with, in character and in quantity, to end with, that no one looks upon the ordinary country justice of the peace than anything more than a man of very ordinary intelligence and ability. But in this jurisdiction it is entirely different.

The character of the work is such, to begin with, and the quantity of the work is such, to end with, that it not only requires a high degree of skill and knowledge on his part of law and legal proceedings, but it consumes his entire time, so that he can not pursue any other line of business while he is serving as justice of the peace.

I might add, in this connection, that every one of these justices of the peace was a lawyer by education and by profession before they were made justices of the peace, having received their degrees from the law schools and passed their examinations for admission to the bar before the courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON. The total for that item, on page 68, will have to be changed. I move to strike out "thirteen" and insert "sixteen," in line 9.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is another amendment to be offered to that paragraph.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to offer an amendment. What was the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was to increase the salaries of the justices of the peace from $2,000 to $2,500 each.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that paragraph still open to amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is open to amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. On page 68, line 8, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, line 8, before the word "hundred," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "nine;" and in the same line, after the word "hundred," to strike out "and fifty;" so as to read:

And the further sum of $900 each for rent, stationery, and other expenses

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator that if his amendment is to go in this bill—and I know the appeal that has been made in its behalf—the words "clerical services" should go in after the word "rent."

Mr. SPOONER. I intend to move that after the amendment I have proposed is acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. In line 8, after the word "rent," I move to insert the words "clerk hire."

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest that the words "clerical services" would be better.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well. Let it read "clerical services."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, line 8, after the word "rent," it is proposed to insert "clerical services."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. In line 9 I move to strike out "thirteen" and insert "twenty," which is a change of the total; and also in the same line to strike out "five" and insert "four," before the word "hundred;" so that the total will read: "$20,400."

Mr. GALLINGER. The clerk of the committee figures the total a little different, and if the Senator will wait a moment we will correct the total. I suggest that the Secretary correct the total.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, let the bill be passed, Mr. President.

Mr. BURKETT. I want to offer an amendment to the bill, if the Senator will permit me. On page 28, after line 9, I move to insert:

For completing the paving of Florida avenue from Eighteenth street to Connecticut avenue, $2,500.

I call the attention of the chairman to the fact that that street is about two-thirds paved, one-third on each side, but the middle third was left open to put in street-car tracks. The street-car tracks have never gone in there, and it is to finish the paving of the street.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state the streets.

Mr. BURKETT. It is between Eighteenth street and Connecticut avenue on Florida avenue.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not, I suggest to the Senator, outside of the boundary, is it?

Mr. BURKETT. It is boundary street.

Mr. GALLINGER. The item in the paragraph to which the Senator has proposed the amendment is for the construction of county roads, and those roads are outside of boundary.

We have never in that paragraph, I will say to the Senator, undertaken to deal with streets inside of the boundary. We have made schedules for the different sections of the city——

Mr. BURKETT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire suggest where it should come in?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator wishes to insert it, let it be on page 25, after line 19.

For completing the paving of Florida avenue from Eighteenth street to Connecticut avenue, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. I desire to offer another amendment. On page 11, at the top of the page, I move to strike out "or municipality."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 2, after the word "corporation," it is proposed to strike out the words "or municipality."

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Presiednt, I will say, if there is any objection to the amendment, that this is the paragraph which provides that the inspector of asphalt paving shall not render any service to any corporation. But some municipalities write to him which can not afford to have an inspector of asphalt, and this precludes him from offering any advice. I have in mind one place where he rendered some very valuable service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is very serious objection to the Senator's amendment. The Senator probably knows the history of this matter, and it is time, it seems to me, that this official of the Government, who is paid a good salary, should attend to his duties here in Washington, and not be interfering with matters outside and deciding between different kinds of asphalt. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. On page 76, in line 13, I move to strike out the words "by the board of charities."

The SECRETARY. On page 76, in the committee amendment already agreed to——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard the committee amendment already agreed to as open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, line 13, after the word "Asylum," strike out "by the board of charities."

Mr. HALE. As my purpose covers several clauses, I will also move, in line 17, to strike out "by the board of charities."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the two amendments will be agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not agreed to, Mr. President. I do not think the Senator from Maine asks for that just now.

Mr. HALE. No. They will all come up in connection with a subsequent amendment I will offer, which covers the whole case. In lines 22 and 23 I move to strike out "by the board of charities;" also on page 77, in line 1, also in line 6, also in lines 9 and 10, also in line 17, also in line 20 I move to strike out the same words.

On page 76, at the end of line 20, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

All appropriations from and including line 11, page 76, of this bill shall be spent under the authority and direction of the officers of each of said charities.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I offer these amendments because I think almost everybody who has had anything to do with these charities is very tired of the board of charities. Every year it appears here or in the other branch and insists that instead of Congress appropriating in detail for these charities, which are well conducted and under conservative management, the whole discretion as to the apportionment of the amount shall be left to this ambitious and engrossing board of charities. For one having had something to do with considering these appropriation bills for years, as I have said, I am very tired of the importunities of the board of charities, which seeks to interfere with the actual management of these different charitable associations. There is not one of those associations which is not well conducted. The management is prudent and conservative and satisfactory to Congress.

Every year this board of charities comes to us and asks Congress to take everything away and to leave entirely discretionary with the board of charities the apportionment of the moneys. I am bound to say that when this ambitious board presents its requests—I will not say demands—to the Senate and to the Senate committee, they do not appeal to the Senate committee; and I have offered these amendments leaving not only, as the committee proposes to do, the amounts specified for each institution, but the management and expenditure of the money to the officers, trustees, and managers of those institutions, so that hereafter we will not be beset by the demands of the board of charities that everything shall be left to their omnipotent hands.

I hope the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who has had great experience and knows a great deal more about the details of these matters than perhaps any other Senator, will be willing to accept the amendments I have offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the board of charities, consisting of five members, was created under the provisions of an act approved June 6, 1900, taking the place of an officer who was then known as superintendent of charities, as I remember it. They had duties imposed upon them which were largely of a supervisory character. They were to be appointed by the President, to serve without pay, and they were to examine into the various charitable institutions of the District, when requested to do so by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make recommendations. They did not have the direct expenditure of money. In fact, their jurisdiction extended only to making investigations along charitable lines and advising in the matters of new buildings for charitable purposes. Up to the present year Congress appropriated the money for these various eleemosynary institutions—the various hospitals and other institutions of that kind—in the city. The board has had supervision of them in a general way, but we have designated the amount of money that should go to each institution.

The board is composed of most excellent gentlemen, some of the leading citizens of this city being upon it—such men as Mr. Edson, Mr. Woodward, and others. Doctor Neill is now on the board, and he is a very efficient man. They have done a great deal of good work without financial compensation. But, like all other boards, certainly in this District, and, I suppose, everywhere else in the world, they have been reaching out for increased power. To carry out a long-cherished purpose, they induced the House of Representatives to appropriate a lump sum in the District of Columbia appropriation bill of the present year, to be distributed by the board upon the various institutions as they saw fit. It is an unfortunate fact that at times the board have expressed themselves as being opposed to giving aid to certain very worthy charities. For instance, they have taken ground against an appropriation to the Home for Incurables, an institution to which one woman gave $50,000, and where patients suffering from cancer and other incurable diseases, excluded from the other hospitals of the city, find a home and are tenderly cared for. We have been giving that institution from two to four thousand dollars a year, and this board has on two or three occasions objected to that, saying it was not a proper appropriation of public money.

During the present year they went into print, as I remember, saying we should not make an appropriation for the Columbia Hospital for Women, etc., an institution that belongs to the Government, land and buildings alike. They have intimated that they thought that institution ought to go out of business, and the patients be distributed among the other hospitals of the city. Some antagonisims have arisen because of the attitude of the board in these matters. I have no doubt they have meant well; I have no doubt they believe it would be a better system of administration if we would yield to their wishes in this regard.

But I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to a matter which, of course, he understands, that the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations struck out the item putting all this money in the hands of the board of charities, to be dispensed by them as they saw fit, and they have provided for each hospital by name, making a specific appropriation in each case, so that the board will be compelled, if this bill shall become a law, to have this money dispensed next year as it has been done in the past.

I doubt very much the propriety of striking out the words that the Senator from Maine suggests ought to come out of the bill. I doubt very much the propriety of raising as sharp an issue as that with the board of charities at the present time. I think if we succeed in keeping in the bill what the committee have placed in it, caring specifically for each institution this year, we will be able to reach an amicable adjustment of this entire matter, and that there will be less friction in the future than there will be if we raise the question as sharply as the Senator from Maine proposes to do. I assure him personally that I will do what I can to bring about an adjustment that will not do harm to anyone, and that will be of the highest possible benefit to these most excellent institutions in the District for which we are making appropriations. So I trust the Senator will not press his amendments any further.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what the amendment is. I did not quite catch it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment, I will say to the Senator, is to strike out in the items providing specifically for each institutions the words "by the board of charities," so that the money will go direct to each institution and be dispensed by the officers of those institutions.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Colorado, an old member of the committee, I know has always had an active and intelligent interest in this whole matter. My object is to prevent, both now and hereafter, the intervention of these ambitious gentlemen comprising the board of charities to take entire possession of the eleemosynary institutions and dole out as they think fitting and best the amount of moneys to each institution, and also, as they claim, to give them the power to close up and abandon certain institutions. I am not for that. I do not think the Senator from Colorado is for that. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire, who has had great experience and has great knowledge on this subject, is for that.

I see the force of his appeal to me that, as, under his advice, the old rule has been restored in the bill and the amounts are specially appropriated for the different institutions, I shall not now insist on going further and striking out all of the nominal control of the board of charities. I hope that as a result of the action of the Senate and of this debate we will hear less hereafter of this board, which comes here every year to change what has been the practice for years and years, and that they will be content to perform the duties that are now given to them by Congress, which are large enough, without seeking to subvert everything Congress has always done, showing confidence in these institutions and maintaining them distinctively in the judgment of Congress and not in the judgment of the board of charities.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I confess I sympathize very greatly with the feeling of the Senator from Maine, but we did not think it was wise at this time to entirely ignore the board. I have a good deal of feeling that the board are quite out of place in insisting that they shall determine how the money shall be expended in the first instance. This is an old claim of theirs which has been made for some time. They have now made the first step which is direct and efficient by persuading the House to put it in their hands. I feel very much that we are quite as capable of doing that duty of distribution as are the board, and I so stated to the board when they were before the committee, and that I did not myself believe that Congress would at any time turn over that duty to them. The way they have insisted upon handling this money for several years is proof enough that they ought not to handle it at all, except in a perfunctory way.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has mentioned the fact that they have been hostile to the Home for Incurables. It is a private charity established in Georgetown by the good people to take care of persons who could not get into the ordinary hospitals. It is a home for incurables of all kinds. We have appropriated only a few thousand dollars annually for that charity, and it has been maintained by the good people of this city. As the Senator from New Hampshire has said, one lady gave $50,000. That was the beginning. Others have contributed, and the women of this District have looked after these incurable people—not always incurable. Sometimes when they were supposed to be incurable it has turned out that they were not. At least within a short time, three persons who were thought to be incurable, and were so pronounced, have been sufficiently relieved of their disabilities to be self-supporting in this city, and are now earning enough to support themselves, and are away from the institution. And yet there was no other place in the city where they could have gone. I have visited this Home for Incurables, which has in it now people who, if turned out, would have no place to go. They would have to go to the pauper home.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are some forty or fifty, are there not?

Mr. TELLER. Forty-five, or such a matter, I believe. All classes are taken in. It is not a sectarian institution. Catholics, Protestants, Jews—every class are taken in if they come within the rule. It is, I think, the most worthy and deserving charity in the city, without exception. We have made an appropriation this year for a little extra help—$3,000 for an elevator, which they need very much, because they have a large number of persons who can not go up and down stairs and who must be taken in the elevator and carried up and down. They have permanent cripples there. Some of them are partly supported by their friends, but many of them are supported entirely by the contributions of the good people, save and except the small sum the Government gives, which never heretofore has been more than $4,000 a year.

For these great institutions we have appropriated as high as a hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. With respect to this little establishment, which is doing as much good as any other in the city, the board of charities came before us and actually said they thought it ought to be disbanded and abandoned. I said: "What will you do with the patients?" They said: "Let the Government build a building." This institution would take care of these unhappy people for a tithe of what the Government could take care of them for. It is economy for us to help in this case. We give only a moiety out of the whole.

I must confess that the attitude of the board heretofore and now has prejudiced me somewhat against the board, and I should very much dislike to see the bill pass and become a law as it came to us from the House. I think it would be very disastrous and hurtful. There is one thing we ought to insist upon, and that is that the control of appropriations belongs to the Congress of the United States, and not to any tribunal or board to which we may intrust the simple payment of it. We should say when and where and how it should be expended. It is enough for them to distribute it. That is all the power they ought to have. We should determine the amount that should go to each institution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his amendments?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I can see plainly that in a matter of this kind a mistake might be made in seeking to go too far. The Senator in charge of the bill has shown very plainly that, so far as he is concerned, he does not believe in turning over the entire disposition of this aggregate sum to the discretion of the board of charities, and I trust that when this matter goes into conference between the two Houses we shall find as a result of the conference that the present rule will be maintained and that the disposition and the amount for each of the eleemosynary institutions shall be, as the Senator from Colorado has indicated, controlled by Congress, and not by the board of charities.

Under these circumstances I will not insist on my amendment, but I notify the Senator that if importunity is kept up and there is this determination to take this subject-matter not only away from us, but away from the very sensible, benevolent, and intelligent persons who have charge of these institutions, on the next appropriation bill I shall certainly try to see that not only shall we distribute the amount of the funds, but that the expenditure of the sums shall be left to the good people who are managing these institutions and the very charitable and benevolent people who have given their benefactions to maintain and sustain them. For the present I withdraw the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine withdraws the amendments.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I should like to submit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 23, page 18, after the word "shall," insert the word "not;" strike out all of line 24, on page 18, after the word "used," and insert the following:

By the Commissioners for any purpose other than to visit such points within the District of Columbia as it may be necessary to visit in order to enable them to inspect or inform themselves concerning any public work or property belonging to the said District or connected with its administration.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, the amendment proposed to line 23, on page 18, is to insert the word "not" after the word "shall;" and in line 24 to strike out all after the word "used" and insert new matter; so that it will read:

That horses and vehicles appropriated for in this act shall not be used by the Commissioners for any purpose other than to visit such points within the District of Columbia as it may be necessary to visit in order to enable them to inspect or inform themselves concerning any public work or property belonging to the said District or connected with its administration.

My reason for offering this amendment is that it came to the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia the past winter that notwithstanding the fact that the language which is now in the bill, which prohibits the use of these horses and vehicles except for official purposes, has been regularly in the District of Columbia appropriation bill since 1903, the Commissioners, or at least two of them, have been using the horses belonging to certain departments of the city government—the department of streets and the fire department—for the purpose of conveying them and their families whenever they thought proper to indulge in that sort of entertainment. In fact, it was shown to the satisfaction of the committee that these vehicles and horses purchased for public use were regularly used by certain of the Commissioners for the purpose of driving to entertainments, to receptions, to theaters, to Chevy Chase, and generally for their own personal pleasure as well as for the performance of their public duties.

If Congress had any object in inserting this provision restricting the use of these horses and vehicles by the Commissioners only when they were engaged in official business, it certainly could not be consistently construed to mean that they could also use these horses and vehicles for pleasure.

If it is the wish of Congress to permit these gentlemen to use drivers and horses paid and purchased at the public expense for their personal pleasure and entertainment, Congress may do it, but in the face of a positive inhibition which can be construed into nothing but a prohibition against using these horses and vehicles for their personal use, it strikes me that it is the duty of Congress to enact the law in such a shape that it can not possibly be ignored on any pretext.

The amendment which I propose does not prevent them from using these horses and vehicles when it is necessary for them to visit public works or the public property, but if its mandate is observed, they will not use them to visit the theater, to drive to receptions and to entertainments during the winter.

The system which is in vogue to-day is objectionable in addition to this, because it is a fact with which the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia are acquainted that the time of employees of the street department and employees of the fire department is taken up by these Commissioners in using them as drivers for these vehicles.

It is unnecessary for me to say anything to the Senate about the wrong, the impropriety, of such practices on the part of the Commissioners. They may be "potent, grave, and reverend seigniors," and very worthy gentlemen, but they illustrate a tendency which is a growing one in this country to-day, to so construe the laws which they themselves have to put into effect as to allow them privileges which the legislature not only does not permit, but, in fact, positively prohibits.

I had hoped that this amendment would have been adopted by the committee. I introduced it on April 25 and had it sent to the committee, hoping that it would be adopted and save me the necessity of making this statement. But inasmuch as the committee did not think proper to do it—I did not go before them and urge it at all, and possibly they may have overlooked it—I deemed it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the practice, which has been indulged in for many years past, which is an abuse, a scandal, and practically a petty piece of graft, which ought to be abolished peremptorily and effectually.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BURKETT. Now I desire to call up and to continue the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia—the bill that we laid aside last night.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the second amendment on page 4. It will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, on page 4, line 15, after the word "taught," to insert:

And he is specifically charged, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification, so far as may be practicable, of the educational work of the colored high schools, and of all the academic and scientific subjects of the Armstrong Manual Training School. And he also shall be charged specifically, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification of the educational work of the intermediary grades of the colored schools.

So as to make the paragraph read:

The colored assistant superintendent, under the direction of the superintendent of schools, shall have sole charge of all teachers, classes, and schools in which colored children are taught. And he is specifically charged, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification, so far as may be practicable, of the educational work of the colored high schools, and of all the academic and scientific subjects of the Armstrong Manual Training School. And he also shall be charged specifically, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification of the educational work of the intermediary grades of the colored schools.

Mr. BURKETT. I move to strike out "intermediary" and insert the word "intermediate" at the end of line 21.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 24, after the words "appoint a," to strike out "supervisor of high schools, who shall have charge of all subjects in the white high schools and of all academic and scientific subjects in the McKinley Manual Training School," and insert "director of intermediate instruction for the white schools who shall have charge under the direction of the superintendent of the unification of educational work of grades 5 to 8, inclusive;" so as to make the paragraph read:

The board, upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of schools, shall appoint a director of intermediate instruction for the white schools who shall have charge under the direction of the superintendent of the unification of educational work of grades 5 to 8, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 6, to insert:

There shall be appointed by the board a director of manual training, who, under the direction of the superintendent, shall have supervision of manual training instruction in the grades.

Mr. BURKETT. In line 7, I move to strike out the word "director" and insert "supervisor;" so as to make it conform with the rest of the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 10, to insert:

The board shall also appoint a superintendent of buildings and supplies, who shall give such security for the faithful performance of the duties of his office as the board of education shall prescribe. He shall have entire jurisdiction of the care of all school buildings and premises, and shall purchase and have the care and distribution of all supplies needed for the schools, under such regulations as the board of education shall prescribe. He shall have as assistants one clerk, one inspector of janitors, and one stenographer and typewriter. The assistants to the superintendent of buildings and supplies shall be appointed by the board of education upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of buildings and supplies.

Mr. BURKETT. I move, as a substitute for the amendment, to insert what I send to the desk. This I do by direction of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment on page 5, beginning with line 11 and ending with line 23, insert:

The board shall also appoint a superintendent of buildings and supplies, at a salary of $3,000 per annum, who shall give such security for the faithful performance of the duties of his office as the board of education shall prescribe, and be subject to removal at the will of the board. He shall have charge of the sanitation and care of all school buildings and premises, and shall purchase and have the care and distribution of all supplies needed for the schools, under such regulations as the board of education shall prescribe. He shall have as assistants one clerk, one inspector of janitors, and one stenographer and typewriter, who shall be appointed by the board of education upon the written recommendation of the superintendent of buildings and supplies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be disagreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 4, to strike out:

Assistants to eighth-grade principals, classes 1 and 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 6, before the word "kindergarten," to insert "of;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Model teachers of first and second grades, and of kindergarten, class 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 15, after the word "classes," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in the same line, after the word "to," to strike out "five" and insert "four, inclusive;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, in the graded schools, classes 3 to 4, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 15, to insert:

Teachers of domestic art and domestic science in high and manual training schools, classes 4 and 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 2, after the word "music," to strike out "domestic science, and domestic art;" in the same line, after the word "schools," to insert "and manual training schools;" and in line 3, after the words "four to," to strike out "five" and insert "Group A, class 6, inclusive;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, music, in the high schools, and manual training schools, classes 4 to Group A, class 6, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. The bill is being read for action on the committee amendments?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For action on the committee amendments.

Mr. CARTER. And other amendments are not now in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. None except the committee amendments.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 8, to insert in the clause for "Head teachers and teachers of normal, high, and manual training schools, Group A, class 6" the following proviso:

Provided, That teachers of the normal, high, and manual training schools now receiving less than $800 shall receive an annual increase not to exceed $150 until the minimum salary of class 6 is reached, when they shall thereafter receive the increase provided in said class: And provided further, That special beginning teachers in the normal school may be appointed for a two years' probationary period upon the recommendation of the principal of the normal school at a salary of $800 for the first year and $900 for the second year, and thereafter, if continued, they shall receive the increase provided for in this class.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 24, after the word "librarian," to strike out "to the board of education" and insert "of the teachers library;" and in line 25, after the word "class," to strike out "five" and insert "four;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Librarian of the teachers library, class 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, on page 8, line 11, before the word "departments," to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to read:

That the board of education shall classify all academic and scientific subjects in the Central, Eastern, Western, and Business high schools and the McKinley Manual Training School into eight departments, so that each department shall contain correlated subjects, and the M Street High School and the Armstrong Manual Training School shall be similarly classified into three departments, so that each department shall contain correlated subjects.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 8, line 17, after the words "head teacher," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That heads of departments as such shall have only an advisory capacity in educational matters, and upon all questions shall be inferior in authority to the principal of each particular school: Provided further, That no class shall be formed in the high schools with less than ten pupils, except in the M Street High School in the case of subjects not offered as well in the Armstrong Manual Training School.

So as to make the paragraph read:

Whenever a department includes two or more high schools, then the teacher in charge of the department shall be designated "head of the department," otherwise the teacher in charge of the department shall be designated "head teacher:" Provided, That heads of departments as such shall have only an advisory capacity, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 20, after the word "another," to strike out "or from one group in class 6 to another, or from one grade of salary to another within Group B;" in line 22, after the word "the" where it occurs the third time, to strike out "supervisor of high schools, or" and insert "officer having direct supervision of said teacher and;" on page 10, line 1, before the word "recommendation," to insert "additional;" and in line 2, after the word "superintendent," to strike out "or supervising principal having supervision of the teacher;" so as to make the clause read:

A teacher shall not be promoted from one class to another except by the board of education, upon the recommendation of the officer having direct supervision of said teacher, and in the case of colored teachers upon the additional recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent. Such recommendations shall in each case be made through and with the approval of the superintendent of schools.

The amendment was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will inquire as to whether any Senator is ready to address the Senate on the unfinished business? No one has advised me of such a desire. [A pause.] I send to the desk an order, and I ask for its adoption.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota proposes an agreement, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Wednesday, June 13, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction, and continue the consideration thereof until 3 o'clock p. m., when debate shall cease and a vote be taken upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that a vote be taken on the bill before adjournment on that day.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the proposition?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is for unanimous consent for a final disposition of the bill on Wednesday, June 13.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is unanimous consent asked at this time?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is a very meager attendance of Senators at this time. There may be no objection to the agreement; but the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who has taken quite an interest in this matter, is not present in the Chamber.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I feel sure that I am authorized to state that the date named is entirely satisfactory to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. President, I feel authorized to say that the proposition is entirely unsatisfactory to other Senators who wish to speak upon this question, and I object to the order being made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to suggest a date when a final vote may be taken on the bill.

Mr. MILLARD. I am not prepared to-day to name a date, but perhaps I may be by Tuesday next. I know of four or five Senators on the lock side of this proposition who wish to speak, which will certainly carry the time beyond Wednesday or Thursday of next week. So I would not be warranted in making any positive suggestion to-day as to a time when the bill could be voted on. I will endeavor to do so as soon as I can confer with one or two Senators who I know desire to speak on this subject, and who are absent from the Senate at this time.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Can the Senator assure me that somebody will be ready to address the Senate upon the bill on Monday?

Mr. MILLARD. I could not say positively that anyone will be ready on that day. I think there will be some one ready to address the Senate on Wednesday.

Mr. KITTREDGE. In the light of the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, I feel compelled to give notice that I shall begin on Monday to push the bill, and that I shall ask for a vote or that some one representing the minority shall address the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition shall be made of the unfinished business?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia.

The next amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, on page 10, line 7, after the letter "B," to strike out "as follows" and insert "of class 6 only after oral and written examinations by the board of examiners upon recommendation as follows;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Teachers shall be promoted for superior work from Group A to Group B of class 6 only after oral and written examinations by the board of examiners upon recommendation as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 9, to strike out the following:

First. All high school teachers upon the recommendation of the supervisor of high schools in the case of white high schools, or upon the recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent in the case of colored high schools.

Second. Upon the recommendation of the director of manual training in the case of manual training schools.

Third. Upon the recommendation of the principal of the normal schools in the case of the normal schools.

And to insert:

All high and normal school teachers and teachers of the manual training schools upon the recommendation of their respective principals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 22, after the word "schools," to insert "and with the additional recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent for the colored teachers;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Such recommendations shall in each case be made through and with the approval of the superintendent of schools, and with the additional recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent for the colored teachers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 25, after the word "teacher," to insert "head of department;" on page 11, line 3, after the word "director," to strike out "and" and insert "or;" in line 4, after the word "until," to strike out "they" and insert "he shall;" in line 5, after the word "board," to insert "of examiners. No person without a degree from an accredited college shall hereafter be appointed to teach academic or scientific subjects in the high schools;" in line 8, after the word "provision," to insert "for examination;" in line 11, after the word "schools," to strike out "or from one group to another in the high, normal, or manual training schools;" and in line 17, after the word "service," to insert "The board of examiners for carrying out the above provisions with reference to examinations shall consist of the suprintendent and two heads of departments of the white schools for the white teachers and of the superintendent and two heads of departments of the colored schools for colored teachers, the designation of such heads of departments for membership on this board to be made by the board of education annually;" so as to make the paragraph read:

No teacher, head of department, principal, or supervising principal shall be appointed to any position in the graded schools, high schools, manual training schools, or normal schools, or no director, assistant director, or teacher of special studies shall be appointed until he shall have passed an examination prescribed by the board of examiners. No person without a degree from an accredited college shall hereafter be appointed to teach academic or scientific subjects in the high schools. This provision for examination shall not apply to teachers coming from the normal schools, or teachers being advanced from the different classes in the grade schools: Provided, That no teacher or officer in the service of the public schools of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act shall, by the operation of this act, be required to take any examination, either mental or physical, to be continued in the service. The board of examiners for carrying out the above provisions with reference to examinations, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 6, after the word "grade," to insert "or of the kindergarten;" so as to make the paragraph read:

For the purpose of this act a model teacher shall be held to be a teacher of the first or second grade, or of the kindergarten, whose special aptitude for primary teaching makes it desirable to retain him in said grades with the pay of a higher grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 11, after the word "years," to insert "or until the maximum is reached;" so as to read:

Teachers of classes 1 and 2 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $25 for four years, or until the maximum is reached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 14, after the word "years," to insert "or until the maximum is reached;" so as to read:

Teachers of class 3 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $25 for ten years, or until the maximum is reached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 17, after the word "years," to insert "or until the maximum is reached;" so as to read:

Teachers of class 4 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $30 for ten years, or until the maximum is reached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 20, after the word "years," to insert "or until the maximum is reached;" so as to read:

Teachers of class 5 shall receive an annual increase of salary of $40 for ten years, or until the maximum is reached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 11, after the word "all," to insert "such;" and in line 12, after the word "salary," to insert "and each shall have entire control of his school, both executive and educational, subject only in authority to the superintendent of schools for the white schools and to the colored assistant superintendent for the colored schools, to whom in each case he shall be directly responsible;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Principals of normal, high, and manual training schools shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, together with an annual increase of $100 for five years. All such principals shall be appointed at the minimum salary, and each shall have entire control of his school, both executive and educational, subject only in authority to the superintendent of schools for the white schools and to the colored assistant superintendent for the colored schools, to whom in each case he shall be directly responsible.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 19, after the word "music," to insert "fifteen hundred dollars, with an annual increase of $100 for five years;" so as to read:

That the salary of the directors shall be as follows: Directors of drawing, physical culture, music, $1,500, with an annual increase of $100 for five years; domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens shall receive a salary of $1,500 per annum with an annual increase of $50 per year for five years, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

The director of primary instruction shall receive a salary of $1,800 per year, with an increase of $50 per year for five years, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 15, after the word "each," to strike out "supervisors of high schools, supervisors," and insert "director of intermediate instruction, supervisor;" so as to make the paragraph read:

PAY OF OFFICERS.

SEC. 9. That the pay of officers shall be as follows: The superintendent, $5,000; the assistant superintendents, $3,000 each; director of intermediate instruction, supervisor of manual training schools, and supervising principals, $2,200 per annum, with an increase of $100 per year for five years.

Mr. BURKETT. In line 17, page 14, I move to strike out the word "schools" after the words "manual training."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. In line 19 on page 14, after the words "for five years," I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the assistant superintendent shall have had at least two years' experience as instructor in high schools of the same or equal grade, or as superintendent or director of such high schools.

This amendment is, I understand, satisfactory to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. I would not want to say that it was agreed to, because the committee has not agreed to it. It is a qualifition, of course, that is put on the assistant superintendent. The Senate has a right to put it on. We can put on special qualifications for any officer we are going to employ. The amendment provides that an assistant superintendent must have had two years' experience in high school. If the Senate desires to do it, it is all right, but I could not agree to it, because I have no authority from the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, on page 14, line 20, before the word "supervisors," to strike out "supervisors of high schools" and insert "director of intermediate instruction;" and in line 23, after the word "act," to insert "unless the said salary is less than that received at the time of his appointment;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Director of intermediate instruction, supervisors of manual training, and supervising principals who may be hereafter appointed shall be appointed at the minimum salary provided in this act unless the said salary is less than that received at the time of his appointment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. In line 21, on page 14, I move to strike out the final "s" in the word "supervisors;" so as to make it read "supervisor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill. On page 7, line 3, I move to strike out the word "four" and insert the word "five" after the word "classes." I trust the Senator from Nebraska will agree to it, so the matter can, at all events, go into conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 3, after the word "classes," strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read: "classes five to Group A, class six, inclusive."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska by whom the appointment of assistants to eighth grade principals is made?

Mr. BURKETT. This bill does not provide for any, I will say to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understand that with the amendment adopted it does not provide for any, but I understand that there is a considerable number of assistants to eighth grade principals.

Mr. BURKETT. There are twenty of them in the District—thirteen white and seven colored.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The provision in line 5, page 6, which was stricken out when my attention was attracted elsewhere, is a provision simply fixing their salaries.

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not understand that it directs the appointment of such assistants.

Mr. BURKETT. It does not, but we took it that if we did away with the salary that the board would not be liable to appoint anyone to the position. That was the object of the committee.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not understand that it interferes with the salary, if appointed legally, but the bill proposes to fix what the salary shall be if they are appointed. So I am inquiring of the Senator as to the source of the appointments—that is, who makes them and under what conditions they may be made?

Mr. BURKETT. The board of education, of course, has been appointing. There are about a hundred and twenty grade schools here. I can not state the exact figures at this moment. These schools run all the way from four-room schools to twenty-room schools. Now, out of the hundred and twenty grade schools there are just twenty of them that have these assistant principals. We could not find any reason why such assistants should be appointed in any particular place, because there are twelve-room schools which do not have them and there are eight-room schools which do have them. Such assistants have been placed here and there apparently without any particular account of the work that is to be done. When the matter was up in the other House the committee in charge went very thoroughly into the question of these supervising principals, and in the House hearings the superintendent said—and I want to say that he in no place recommends a discontinuance of the assistant, but he did say that the supervising principal of these schools is the real principal in fact for the organization of the work and the supervising of instruction, and all that kind of thing. Each of these supervising principals will be in charge of half a dozen or more of these grade schools, and he is the principal in the ordinary sense.

Your committee felt upon this showing and from these hearings—the thirteen supervising principals being the real principals—that the nominal principal of the school, as a matter of fact, is an assistant principal. He does not have anything particularly to do except to teach; he is merely the head teacher, what is called the head teacher of a particular school. But the man in charge of that school is the supervising principal, and the committee thought to give to the head teacher of that school an assistant was not necessary. Furthermore, we thought if it was necessary, that all the schools ought to have an assistant or else none of them should have them. That is the reason the committee left them out. There has never been anywhere in any of the hearing, so far as we can find, any particular reason given for an assistant principal.

I will say to the Senator that some of these assistant principals and some of the principals who have them are looking out, of course, in their own interest for the reinstatement of this provision for their salary.

They would get a little more wages if they were called assistant principals. They have been to members of the committee, as I have no doubt they have been to other Senators, urging that they be retained. They are not, in the judgment of the committee, necessary for the welfare of the schools. They will draw more salaries under this bill anyway; and your committee thought it best to leave them out. That is the object of it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I find that there are thirteen of these great school buildings where there is an assistant principal, and that in none of these buildings are there fewer than twelve classes. The principal of that building herself teaches a class and has from forty to forty-five pupils to teach and to carry along until they are prepared to enter the high school. I can conceive very easily why it is that, in certain cases, the board of education has seen fit to give these teachers an assistant; I can understand why, perhaps, in some cases they have seen fit not to appoint an assistant; but when you remember that there is placed upon the shoulders of a lady the duty of teaching a class of forty-five pupils all the hours of the day and at the same time she has charge of the building, with over twelve to twenty teachers under her, having charge of all the rooms, being the first to whom complaints are made, supervising and caring for the building and the grounds, receiving supplies and distributing them to the pupils, and making the requisitions, and at the same time making elaborate reports to officers above her—it seems to me that it is all wrong to cut out the right of the board of education to appoint an assistant where, in their judgment, they think one is necessary. I do not understand that the amendment forbids the right to appoint such assistant, but that it simply cuts out the provision saying what their salaries shall be when they are appointed. I was wondering if the Senator having the bill in charge would not prefer to leave that matter just as it is, so that if the board of education sees fit in any case to appoint an assistant, where the board thinks an assistant is required, that the salary for such assistant shall be defined in the law.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, I would say, Mr. President, in response to the Senator, that I have a list here of thirteen schools. For instance, the Sumner School, a nine-room school, has a principal; the next is the Briggs School, which has thirteen rooms and has no principal; the next is the Mott School, which has twenty rooms, and that has no principal. We found that these principals have not been assigned with reference, apparently, to the amount of work; they have apparently been appointed—I do not want to say it—but where a good person ought to have more salary—to provide for them. We have, however, provided salaries for these good persons under this proposed law. Let me read what the superintendent says on this subject. You see this principal does not have the regular duty of a principal of schools. Here is what Superintendent Stuart said before the House committee:

Mr. MORRELL. Referring to these supervising principals, can you give the committee some idea of what their duties are?

Mr. STUART. The elementary schools, as I have stated, are divided into thirteen groups—four colored and nine white. That is to say, there are practically thirteen districts.

You may call this man a district superintendent, if you please, instead of a supervising principal. He is called a district superintendent in New York and so called in Philadelphia. He is the executive officer for that group of schools. He will have from 75 to 100 elementary school teachers under his charge. He has his office in one of the buildings, and his duties consist in organizing, when the schools are opened in September, the schools of that district, making necessary recommendations as to assignments of teachers, promotions of teachers, classification of pupils, and he also attends to all administrative matters relating to discipline. These thirteen men, if I could find a parallel in any other department of the District government, would correspond, we will say, to the lieutenants in the police force, each having his jurisdiction and having entire administrative responsibility for his district, and reporting to the central head.

Mr. MORRELL. Let me ask you, what extra compensation does the principal of a building get?

Mr. STUART. I was about to state in regard to the duties of these principals of buildings that are principals only in the sense that they are the chief teachers—the teachers of the highest grade within the building, usually without an assistant, and consequently they have no supervisory power over the instruction, none whatever. The principals of these small buildings having no control over the instruction, in fact no authority in any schoolrooms except their own, has necessitated the supervision by the supervising principal. It is the supervising principal who in his group of schools looks after matters of instructions. He visits the schools; examines the schools. It is the supervising principal who does that. He attends to cases of discipline which are appealed from the teacher, the principal of the building being without an independent authority which a principal of a building in the city of New York would have or in any other great cities where he has an assistant.

It is the superintendent of schools who uses those words. The principal of a school so designated is simply a head teacher.

We give them in this bill $30 more salary for each room in such a school because they are principals, but such principals have no authority in any other room than their own, as the superintendent says, and no particular duty, except as head teacher over eight or ten or twelve teachers who may happen to be in that school. What in the world the duties of assistants would be unless it might be to answer the telehone or to attend the door, or something of that sort, I am unable to see. If anything happens in the school, they send for the supervising principal, who is the real principal. The principal does not have anything to do with it, and there is no need for an assistant, in our judgment.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I am informed that that is not the fact; that the calls made upon the principal of the school come from the other schools in the same building; that she must be constantly prepared to leave her room to look after one thing or another, the calls of other teachers, etc., and that in this additional work, the care of buildings and grounds, receiving supplies and of making the reports, all that immense work devolves upon her, so that she really requires an assistant. I have called attention to the matter, because I thought, perhaps, the committee had not full information in regard to it.

Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment striking out line 5, on page 6, was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, which will be stated, was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 4, an amendment was heretofore agreed to striking out line 5, as follows:

Assistants to eighth-grade principals, classes 1 and 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment just stated was agreed to.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to come in on page 7, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 10, of the committee amendment which has been agreed to, it is proposed to insert——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendment having been agreed to, without objection, it will be considered as open to amendment. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 10, in the amendment proposed by the committee, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert "who have not taught five years or more in graded or high schools."

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to explain to the Senate just what that amendment is. I am not authorized by the committee to accept it.

The committee found that there were seventy-two teachers in the District who had been appointed at salaries away down to $500; in fact, there are some who receive from $500 to $550, and from that on up to $725. There would be seventy-two of them, as I now recall, whose salaries would be increased all the way from $250 up to $500 the very first year. The bill as it came from the House provided that where school-teachers of a high school now receive $500 they shall be advanced to $1,000 next year. Our committee thought that the increase was too much. We provided that any teacher whose salary is less than $800 should be increased only $150 each year until the salary reached is the thousand-dollar minimum in that particular class.

The Senator offers an amendment to make an exception, and the Senator proposes that, because a teacher has taught five years or more and is receiving less than $800, that on account of having taught five years he shall be immediately promoted to $1,000. The objection to that is this: Simply because the teacher has been here a number of years does not make him a good teacher. The particular teacher the Senator has in mind is no doubt a good teacher, but, take it as a whole, these teachers ought not to be raised from $250 to $500 the first year. The increase is too much, your committee believes.

The committee thought that the better way to do was to limit that increase to $150. That was an unusually large increase. It is four times larger than the average increase of salaries of teachers in this bill. In fact, there is not anybody who gets that much increase except these teachers who have been hired at a less salary, coming into the school without any examination and without any requisite preparation for teaching in the high school, at a salary of $500 a year.

I could not accept the amendment, because I am not authorized to do so by the committee, and it seems to me it is an amendment that ought not to be passed. I think $150 increase for a teacher is enough in the first year, and it is all that should be allowed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator has stated the reasons which impel me to offer the amendment, although he is mistaken with reference to the limitation provided in the amendment itself. I understand the fact to be that teachers hereafter hired will be employed at $1,000 per year. We will have the anomalous condition of teachers of more than five years' experience—and I am told in the list of seventy-two there are about ten such—who are now receiving $700 per annum, being compelled to work for $850 the coming year, whereas the teacher hired next September, of like experience, will be receiving $1,000.

I can readily perceive that a teacher might quickly evade the law by resigning and being reappointed, but it is desirable that such subterfuge should not be rendered necessary as to experienced teachers. The teachers of the $500 class would not chance resigning and passing an examination, but a teacher who has taught in a graded or high school for five years is presumably by virtue of that long experience a thoroughly competent teacher. If during the five years' period of teaching a proper standard of excellence has not been made manifest on the part of the individual, the teacher would evidently be dropped from the position.

The injustice of it, Mr. President, is so gross that I am compelled to offer this amendment, and to insist that the committee of conference shall consider the extent to which this five-year limitation shall apply, and to consult with the superintendent of schools with a view to ascertaining whether or not this limitation is not in the interest of justice and fair dealing. If they ascertain that it is a proper amendment, I think the committee of conference will gladly retain it. I would not have this amendment accepted without investigation. I am informed that but eight or ten teachers, and no greater number, who have been performing faithful service in the graded and high schools here for over five years will be embraced within the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. How many?

Mr. CARTER. Between seven and ten. It would be manifestly improper to compel these teachers, in order to evade the law, to first resign their positions and then get reappointed. I think the minimum salary ought to attach to these experienced teachers without the intervention of any such subterfuge.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" have it.

Mr. CARTER. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT and others. Oh, no.

Mr. CARTER. I will not insist upon the yeas and nays, but I am satisfied this amendment is just. I only ask the courtesy of an examination by the conference committee into its merits. The statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] that seventy-two persons would instantly have their salaries increased is not correct. The amendment would only apply, I am informed, to from seven to ten persons who have been engaged in this class of work for over five years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the question on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BURKETT. I know the Senator does not want to state that I would make a statement that I did not think was correct in any way. The report on the bill contains some information on this feature, which, I will say, was furnished me by the superintendent at my request. The committee has gone all over this matter with the superintendent of schools, and has canvassed it very thoroughly. Action was not taken hastily at all. It was submitted and read aloud at the hearing of the teachers. On page 5 of the committee report you will find just the number in each class. I will read it.

There will be three teachers who will advance from $500 to $1,000; one teacher who will advance from $525 to $1,000; one teacher from $550 to $1,000——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BURKETT. Just as soon as I finish my statement I will yield to the Senator.

Seventeen teachers will advance from $600 to $1,000; fourteen teachers will advance from $650 to $1,000; one teacher will advance from $675 to $1,000; sixteen teachers will advance from $700 to $1,000; seventeen teachers will advance from $750 to $1,000; and two teachers will advance from $775 to $1,000.

There is a total of seventy-two teachers who will have an advance the very first year without this amendment of from $225 to $500 each. The committee thought that we ought to limit a teacher's increase to $150.

Mr. CARTER. Under the amendment which designates teachers who have taught for five years or more, it is obvious that the Senator does not understand that the salaries of these seventy-two would instantly be increased.

Mr. BURKETT. Oh, no; I did not so state, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. My information may be inaccurate, but I was informed that the amendment I have proposed would result in fixing at the minimum on the new basis the salaries of from seven to ten teachers who would come in the classification contemplated by the amendment.

Mr. BURKETT. Does the Senator know what the salary is of the particular teacher whom he has in mind?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know.

Mr. BURKETT. I did not know but what the Senator might know.

Mr. CARTER. The teacher who brought the matter to me said that it had the approval of the superintendent. She is a young lady, whom I have known for many years, a citizen of Montana, a teacher of Latin, German, and English literature in one of the high schools, and a graduate, I think, of a college in Germany. She is a very thoroughly competent lady.

Mr. BURKETT. Of course, a teacher who has been in the schools five years ought not to fall below this, as a matter of fact. A teacher with such qualifications can very easily take an examination and come in as a new teacher in the high school. It would not be subterfuge. In fact, the schools should welcome the proposition to have the teachers on these low salaries resign, and then only those could get back who could pass the examination.

Mr. SCOTT. That is exactly what we want.

Mr. BURKETT. That is exactly what we are trying to do. We are trying to build up the tone and standard of the schools.

Mr. CARTER. Then the amendment, as I understand it, would only operate to obviate the necessity of an examination. Is that the Senator's proposition?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; that would get some of them in without taking an examination.

Mr. CARTER. I had no purpose of having any teacher who could not pass an examination, if an examination is required, legislated into an increase of salary.

Mr. BURKETT. That might be the effect of the Senator's amendment. As he stated in the beginning of his remarks, they could resign and take an examination, and come in at a thousand dollars, if they could pass the requirements of a thousand-dollar teacher.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the Senator accept the amendment and take it into conference, and let the facts be very clearly and distinctly ascertained from the school authorities of the District. I can perceive no injury to result from that, and some injustice might be avoided.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not participated in this debate for the reason that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] is in charge of the bill, and he knows infinitely more about it than I do; but I want to appeal to him to let the amendment the Senator from Montana has offered be agreed to. Then it will go into conference, and if, upon further examination, the committee find that it ought not to remain in the bill, I am sure the Senator from Montana will graciously agree that it shall go out.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, since the chairman of the committee advises it, I will very gladly accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," on page 7, line 10, it is proposed to insert "who have not taught five years or more in graded or high schools."

Mr. TELLER. It is pretty difficult to understand the connection unless the context is read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the provision as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That teachers of normal, high, and manual training schools now receiving less than $800, who have not taught five years or more in graded or high schools, shall receive an annual increase not to exceed $150 until the minimum salary of class 6 is reached.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it seems to me it is a little difficult to tell what the effect of that will be. I want to call the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge to a fact in this connection. I notice that he said that a teacher receiving a less salary than $800 might resign and then be examined. There is no reason why a teacher who is getting $750 should be required to resign before he or she is allowed to take the examination. If they are able to qualify themselves for the thousand-dollar position, they ought to be allowed to do it without resigning. In other words, this bill appears to give the outsider some opportunities that it does not give to the teacher already in the schools.

Here is a teacher, for instance, who may have taught five or six years, and she is still below the $800 grade. She wants to be examined. She is told, "Well, you can not be examined so long as you are on the roll of teachers. You must resign; you must abandon your position." Mr. President, there is no reason on the face of the earth for that.

Mr. BURKETT. The committee took the position that $150 was enough increase for any teacher. The teachers to whom the Senator referred in the main are teachers—there may be an exception here and there, but you can not make a bill for exceptional cases—in the main they are teachers who have been taken in at a low salary and have been educated and trained by these supervisors and special teachers and normal schools all the way along and prepared for this work. They have received promotions also. The teacher to whom we are going to give a thousand-dollar salary must have a college education and a college degree, and he must pass an examination before the board of examiners. The seventy-two teachers never passed any examination when they were appointed; they never had to have a college degree, and many of them do not have a college degree. There may be exceptions. No doubt the Senator has one in mind. I think I have the same one in mind who may have a college degree. But, as I have said, you can not make a bill for exceptions.

It seemed to your committee that for a teacher who has been receiving from $500 a year up to $725, to give such a one $150 increase the first year and another $150 the next year was enough for most of them.

Mr. TELLER. Teachers should be taken into the force according to their qualifications. If a teacher has been instructed, as the Senator says, by teaching five years, if she is able to pass the examination, she should not be excluded because she has been teaching for a less sum. The door to the $1,000 position ought to be open to every teacher, provided she has, as the Senator says, a college education and shall be able to pass the examination. There are teachers in the lower grades with good education, with experience of some years, and with college certificates, and they are excluded.

Mr. President, I attach some importance to the examination, but I attach very little importance to the college certificate. I have had some experience with college certificates. I think the certificates of certain classes of colleges can be relied on with some degree of confidence, but not the certificates of all colleges. You may have a certificate from some college where they do not make very scholarly graduates. There are some such in this country, and there have been more in the past than there are now.

While I am not going to attempt to reform this bill, because I know how difficult it is to interfere with it, I insist that there is a defect in the bill; that the $1,000 position is not open to everyone who possesses the qualification of having a certificate from some college and is able to pass the examination.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the bill before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 13, I move to insert the word "assistant" before "superintendent," in line 14.

I wish to state briefly the reasons for it, and if the Senator who is in charge of the bill still thinks I am in error, I shall not greatly insist upon the amendment; but I think I can satisfy the Senator that I certainly am not in error, as far as concerns the object sought.

On page 4 of this bill we have this provision:

The white assistant, under the direction of the superintendent of schools, shall have general supervision over the white schools.

A second proposition:

And is specifically charged, under the direction of the superintendent, with the unification, as far as may be practicable, of the educational work of the white high schools.

One of the duties that is imposed upon the assistant superintendent is the unification of the high schools. If we will turn to page 13 we will find this provision:

Principals of * * * high * * * schools—

I am omitting all except that which bears directly on the point—

Principals of * * * high * * * schools * * * each shall have entire control of his school, both executive and educational, subject only in authority to the superintendent of schools for the white schools.

How can the assistant superintendent have supervision and be specifically charged with the unification of the educational work of the high schools if in the same bill you provide that the principal of the high school shall have both executive and educational authority, subject only to the superintendent? In other words, how can the assistant supervise the work of the principal of a high school if that principal is not subject to his authority? We have in this two systems. The assistant superintendent, under the provision on page 4, is given authority and it is made his duty to unify the system of study and all matters pertaining to those high schools.

Now, the only way, it seems to me, in which he can enforce obedience to any order or requirement he may make with reference to such unification is to have the authority to compel it to be obeyed. And yet, turning to page 13, the bill specifically provides that the principal of the school shall be supreme so far as the educational work is concerned. That being the case, certainly the Senator must agree with me that the assistant superintendent could not compel the unification and that it would be thrown upon the general superintendent.

The general superintendent ordinarily, I assume, has business enough of his own without attending specifically to the unification of the system in the high schools. This unification not only covers branches of study, but the text-books which shall be used, the rules that shall govern in the admission of students and in their expulsion, the military exercises, and everything of that character. They should be exactly the same in every one of the high schools, so that a certificate of graduation from one high school will be evidence that the student has passed through the same course that any other student would be required to pass through in graduating from any other high school. Of course, I understand that the Senator expects that the system will be unified, and while there is to be a degree of independence on the part of the principal of the school in reference to promotions, in reference to the method by which the instruction is to be carried on, yet, notwithstanding that, the Senator will agree with me, I think, that they are totally without any head or any governing power unless that governing power is the general superintendent of all the schools.

In order to make this one section consistent with the other, I ask that the word "assistant" be used before the word "superintendent," so that the assistant superintendent of the white high schools shall have just the same power that the assistant superintendent of the colored schools has.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I regret that I did not make myself plain to the Senator from North Dakota with respect to why the colored assistant superintendent is given more power apparently than the white assistant superintendent. As the bill came from the House, it had right at the beginning of the section pertaining to the duties of the colored assistant the word "sole," giving the colored assistant superintendent sole power over the colored schools. The Senator from North Dakota complains because the colored assistant superintendent has authority over the colored principals and that the white assistant superintendent does not have authority over the white principals. The point is this: The colored assistant superintendent is, in practice, as the House has made the bill and as the Senate has adopted it, the acting superintendent. He is the real boss of the colored schools, so to speak. On the other hand, in the case of the white schools, the white superintendent himself is the head in name and in fact. If on page 13 you provide that the principal shall be inferior to the assistant superintendent, and the assistant superintendent shall be inferior to the superintendent, and then below the principal is the teacher, it will place the pupil five steps off from the superintendent.

What the committee wanted to do all the time was to take up the coupling; to check up the lost motion, so to speak; to make nobody responsible for the Western High School or the Central High School or the Eastern High School above the principal but the superintendent, and not to have any intermediate steps.

The superintendent occupies practically the same position all the way through the bill that the colored assistant superintendent does. If I had had my way in framing the bill, I would have checked them all up to the superintendent. But the House established the other policy, and the Senate committee thought it best, and I think after consideration of the hearings probably it is best. We make a principal directly responsible to the superintendent in the white schools and to the colored assistant in the colored schools. Of course in both schools the superintendent has final authority.

If the Senator will notice, on page 4, the white assistant superintendent is not given authority to do anything except under the direction of the superintendent. On page 13 it says that the white principal shall be responsible to the superintendent. Suppose you made him responsible to the assistant superintendent, as the Senator from North Dakota proposes; you would make him responsible to a man who can not do anything, according to the bill, on page 4, except under the direction of the superintendent. What is the use of fooling about it? Let him be responsible to the man who has the power to direct.

That was done after a good deal of consideration, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, in order to make those two paragraphs absolutely conform in authority and in duty. So that it is absolutely essential in there. You would spoil the whole bill if you changed that clause. That runs all the way through to make the superintendent the real head.

Let me use an illustration. A Senator may have an assistant as a secretary. He gives that secretary certain prerogatives, certain duties, certain functions. The assistant performs them; and yet the Senator would not want to abdicate the throne or to make the secretary supreme in any matter. And yet the Senator does give him certain things to do, which he perhaps hardly ever checks up himself; about which the Senator does not give him any directions except in a general way. The secretary performs those duties. Perhaps he hardly ever calls the attention of the Senator to them. Yet the Senator would not want to give absolute authority to the assistant in those matters. In short, he wants to keep within himself the power of checking the matter up.

The result of this will be that the assistant superintendent will be the director of the high schools. He will perform that function. The chances are the superintendent will never have to call him down on anything. But if anything came up, if he did anything which, in the judgment of the superintendent, he ought not to do, the committee believed that the superintendent ought to have the final authority. The committee believed that we should make the superintendent responsible for the schools and at the same time give him authority.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska says the result which is evidenced by this amendment is what he thinks after thinking. I again call the Senator's attention to the principal question I asked him, Why give the assistant superintendent supervision over the unification of a school and at the same time say that he shall have no power to enforce the orders in reference to the unification?

Mr. BURKETT. He has all the power of the superintendent behind him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us see what the powers are. The assistant superintendent under this bill directs the principal of the high school to instruct in certain branches. The principal of the high school declines to give instruction in those branches. What can the assistant superintendent do? He can not do a thing except report the matter to the general superintendent, and the general superintendent therefore would have to perform the functions and the duties that are given to the assistant superintendent. If the assistant superintendent is to have no power in the matter, why give him the function if he can not exercise it? Why say to him that he shall be charged with the unification of the system when you also say that any order that he may make in reference to such unification he shall have no power to enforce, but must always go to the superintendent?

Of course I assume that the general superintendent should be given authority over the assistant superintendent, and the appeal would lie from his decision to the general superintendent. But that proposition, it seems to me, leaves the bill not in the very best shape and with a conflict of authority. For my part, if I was framing the bill, in order to make it consistent, I would strike out that section charging him with the unification of the high schools and place it where it really is placed—in the hands of the general superintendent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask one more question of the Senator from Nebraska. On page 11 of the bill provision is made for an examining board for the examination of teachers. Will the Senator inform the Senate what has heretofore been the method with reference to the examination of teachers for our schools?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that there has not been much examination, I regret to say, in the schools heretofore. There has been some talk of a plan of examination, but as near as I can find out, it has not been adhered to very closely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. Let me suggest this to the Senator: He is thoroughly acquainted with the school systems throughout the country, as is evidenced by his debate upon this bill. The superintendent calls to his assistance, in the matter of the examination, the heads of departments, and those, as I understand, are the principals of the high schools.

Mr. BURKETT. Not necessarily; and, in fact, I think they are not.

Mr. McCUMBER. What are they?

Mr. BURKETT. For instance, in English the head of the department is some especially good teacher in English whom the board designates as the head. The head of mathematics may be a teacher in the Central School, but the board of education designates him as the head of mathematics. Then they may combine French and German and Spanish and call it a department of modern languages, and appoint some teacher in one of those languages as the head in all the schools. In no instance, I think, is it a principal. I would not say positively that it is not, but I think not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, as I understand, the principal will call to his assistance, say, a teacher in mathematics in the higher grades?

Mr. BURKETT. No. The board, at the beginning——

Mr. McCUMBER. He may do so.

Mr. BURKETT. The board, at the beginning of each year, will select two white persons to be members of the white board of examiners and two colored persons to be members of the colored board of examiners, and they would select these from the heads of departments. We said heads of departments because we thought that the best teachers would always be heads of departments and would make the best examining board, probably.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do not those heads of departments and those who are very proficient in their own line of work become specialists in that line, and would a person who has taught, we will say, for eight or ten or fifteen years, English or the higher branches of mathematics, necessarily be the proper person to conduct an examination for teachers for the kindergarten, for instance, or for other grades? Would it not be better to leave it entirely to the board as to whom they shall select for the examination of teachers for the high schools and the examination of teachers for the graded schools, instead of naming the particular individuals who shall fill these places?

Mr. BURKETT. In reply to the Senator I will say that we thought of that, and the objection to it is this: I never saw a greater demand among teachers for examinations than appeared on the part of the teachers of this school. But all with whom I talked expressed the wish that a board might be made definite and certain, at least at the beginning of each year. They would rather have a definite and certain board, however constructed, than to have a board that might be created at any time for any special examination or for any particular class of teachers. In short, if you leave it open, it has been suggested that there might be favoritism here and there. Therefore, if the board of examiners is created at the beginning of the year for all the examinations to be made in that year, there is less possibility of a board being created with an eye single to the examination of some special persons. And that is why we specify of whom it shall consist.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator give me any idea as to the number of examinations that will be had in a year?

Mr. BURKETT. No; I can not, because there are——

Mr. McCUMBER. It occurs to me that placing this extra work upon these heads of departments, as you call them, may seriously interfere with their own work.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that we have looked that matter up, and it is quite the usual custom to have somebody connected with the schools do it. The number of examinations will not be excessive, we think, in any year. It will only be for the new teachers coming in and those desiring to take the examination for the purpose of securing a promotion from one group to another, etc. The number will not be excessive.

Mr. McCUMBER. I accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. BURKETT. We have considered that a good deal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, LEWIS AND CLARKE COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6234) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company of Montana to construct a bridge across the Missouri River in Lewis and Clarke County, Mont. It is a bridge bill and will require but a few moments to pass.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAM ACROSS NIOBRARA RIVER, NEBRASKA.

Mr. MILLARD. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CLAPP. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLARD. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17982) to grant to Charles H. Cornell, his assigns and successors, the right to abut a dam across the Niobrara River on the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., and to construct and operate a trolley or electric railway line and telegraph and telephone line across said reservation.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CORPORATE CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAPP. I realize that we are getting near the close of the session, and that it will perhaps do no harm to yield for the consideration of some of these short bills, but I can not yield to many of them. I must get along with the conference report.

Mr. FORAKER. I will be very glad if the Senator will yield to this one, because there is a great moral purpose to be subserved, and it ought not to be longer delayed.

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4563) to prohibit corporations from making money contributions in connection with political elections.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Ohio that the bill has been read two or three times heretofore.

Mr. FORAKER. It has been read. There are some amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The amendments of the Committee on Privileges and Elections were, on page 1, line 3, after the word "bank," to strike out "or any corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce;" in line 9, after the word "which," to insert "Presidential and Vice-Presidential electors or;" in line 11, before the word "any," to strike out the word "with;" in the same line, after the word "election," to strike out "or attempted election" and insert "by any State legislature;" on page 2, line 3, after the word "officer," to strike out "stockholder" and insert "or;" and in line 4, before the word "of," to strike out "or employee;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any laws of Congress, to make a money contribution in connection with any election to any political office. It shall also be unlawful for any corporation whatever to make a money contribution in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice-Presidential electors or a Representative in Congress is to be voted for, or any election by any State legislature of a United States Senator. Every corporation which shall make any contribution in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000, and every officer or director of any corporation who shall consent to any contribution by the corporation in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND ON DEER ISLAND, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6333) authorizing the Secretary of War to acquire, for fortification purposes, certain tracts of land on Deer Island, in Boston Harbor, Massachusetts.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in section 1, page 1, line 12, after the word "wall," to insert "which shall be approved by the Secretary of War;" in section 2, page 2, line 21, after the word "ascertain," to insert "and determine;" in line 23, after the word "and," to strike out "transmit an estimate of" and insert "shall certify;" and in line 24, after the word "Congress," to strike out "with his recommendation in the premises" and insert "for consideration;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to acquire for fortification purposes, from the city of Boston, two certain tracts of land on Deer Island, in Boston Harbor, Massachusetts, containing together about 100 acres above mean low-water mark, the said tracts being marked on the ground by certain monuments, and to pay for the same not to exceed the sum of $250,000 from funds heretofore appropriated for purchase of sites for fortifications and seacoast defenses: Provided, That the city of Boston shall build a masonry wall, which shall be approved by the Secretary of War, at least 10 feet in height above the ground level, extending across said Deer Island, to separate the portion of said island hereby authorized to be acquired from the remaining portion of said island; and shall remove the piggery from the portion of the island hereby authorized to be acquired, and discontinue interments in the cemetery within said area, and shall permit the United States Government to connect its water mains with the city's water-supply mains on said island, and furnish water to the Government at current rates: Provided further, That before making payment for the said land the Secretary of War may require the city of Boston to execute such valid agreement or obligation as he may consider necessary to insure full compliance with all the requirements of the foregoing proviso.

SEC. 2. That the United States shall be liable for any damage to the property of the city of Boston or to the works of the North Metropolitan Sewerage System located on said island that may be caused by the firing of guns in time of peace from batteries erected within the area that may be acquired as aforesaid; and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed, whenever any such damage occurs, to ascertain and determine what would be a reasonable and proper compensation to pay the city of Boston and shall certify the same to Congress for consideration.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INFORMATION CONCERNING CROPS BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICERS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6248) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 5501a. Every officer and employee of the United States and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any department or office of the Government, who shall, by virtue of the office or position held by him, become possessed of any information which might exert an influence upon or affect the market value of any product of the soil grown within the United States, which information is required by law or under the rules and practices of any department of the Government to be withheld from publication until a fixed time, who shall willfully impart, either directly or indirectly, said information, or any part thereof, to any person not entitled under the law or rules and practices of the department of the Government to receive same, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than ten years and may be fined in any sum not to exceed $10,000.

"SEC. 5501b. Every officer of the United States and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity under or by virtue of any department of office of the Government, who shall, by virtue of the office or position held by him, become possessed of any information which might exert an influence upon or affect the under or by virtue of any department or office of the Government, who shall, before said information is made public through regular official channels, either directly or indirectly, speculate in said product by selling or buying same in any quantity, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 and may be imprisoned for not more than ten years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is a very remarkable bill. I can not consent to its consideration. I have not examined it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will say to the Senator from Maine that this identical bill has passed the Senate, with the exception that it is now sought to apply the rule to the information that may be given out with respect to products of the soil. In other words, it relates to the case which the Senator will recall as having occurred last year in the Department of Agriculture, to speculating on information given out in regard to cotton by the officials of that Department. A similar bill has passed the Senate heretofore, and the objection to it in another body was that it included speculation in stocks and bonds and included Members of the two Houses. This bill has been so framed as to eliminate those objections, so that it is confined now to giving out information from the Department; for instance, as to how many bales of cotton will be produced, and to speculating in cotton upon the strength of those reports given out by the officials of the Agricultural Department. I trust the Senator will not object to its consideration.

Mr. HALE. It seems to be here considered an answer to every Senator's serious objection that some day or other the Senate has inadvertently passed a bill. My surprise is that the Senator from Texas, who is a careful Senator, a conservative Senator, and who, I hope, does not believe in these extreme far-reaching measures of the Government taking control and punishing men for giving information, punishing them largely, has reported such a bill. I am very sorry that such a bill ever passed the Senate. It never ought to pass the Senate again.

I can not consent to its consideration until I have an opportunity of examining it and seeing how far it goes. But I am continually amazed at the bills which are brought in here taking possession of almost every avenue of business and providing penalties with regard to matters that a few years ago never would have been brought into the domain of national legislation. I must insist on my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine objects to the consideration of the bill.

STEPHENSON GRAND ARMY MEMORIAL.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 29) authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for the Stephenson Grand Army memorial in Washington, D. C.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on the Library with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the word "the" where it occurs the third time, to strike out "chairman" and insert "secretary;" and in the same line, before the word "treasurer," to insert "the;" so as to make the section read:

That the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War, and the secretary and the treasurer of the Stephenson memorial committee of the Grand Army of the Republic are hereby created a commission and authorized to select a site upon the property belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, other than the Capitol and Library grounds, for the erection of the Stephenson Grand Army memorial, to be presented by the Grand Army of the Republic to the people of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That the joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument or statue in Washington City, D. C., in honor of the late Benjamin F. Stephenson, founder of the Grand Army of the Republic, approved May 3, 1902, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CLAPP. I shall have to object to unanimous consent for the consideration of further bills.

Mr. BULKELEY. It will not take three minutes to dispose of this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. When I called up the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill I knew of three Senators who I understood wanted to make objections to it, and as I found none of them were in the Chamber I had no objection to consuming a little time until they should arrive. I did not care to press the report in their absence. They have now arrived in the Senate, and I must ask for the consideration of the report.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have been trying to find the amendment of the conferees on which I raise a point of order. This report on the Indian appropriation bill is not altogether as lucid in its explanation of what has been done as was the report on the rate bill. If Senators will get the pamphlet print of the conference report and will then look on page 61 of the bill they will find amendment No. 191, which relates to the Colville Reservation and reads as follows:

COLVILLE RESERVATION.

To carry into effect the agreement bearing date May 9, 1891, entered into between the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation and commissioners appointed by the President of the United States under authority of the act of Congress approved August 19, 1890, to negotiate with the Colville and other bands of Indians on said Colville Reservation for the cession of such portion of said reservation as said Indians might be willing to dispose of, there shall be set aside and held in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of said Indians, which shall at all times be subject to the appropriation of Congress and payment to said Indians, in full payment for 1,500,000 acres of land opened to settlement by the act of Congress "To provide for the opening of a part of the Colville Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1892, the sum of $1,500,000, of which sum $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the benefit of said Indians.

Mr. President, this is a Senate amendment and it relates to the purchase of these lands and the payment therefor. The conference committee have brought in the provision which I shall read, and I wish Senators would pay attention to it, because they can not get the gist of the point of order that I make unless they do.

Mr. NELSON. What is the amendment? Will the Senator be kind enough to state it?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is amendment No. 191.

Mr. NELSON. On what page?

Mr. TILLMAN. On page 61 of the bill. I now read the action of the conference committee:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 191, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 18, down to and including the word "Indians," at the end of line 21, and insert—

Senators will see that the words stricken out here cover the appropriation of $150,000, and in place of that we have the following inserted:

"And jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment in the name of Butler & Vale (Marion Butler and Josiah M. Vale), attorneys and counselors at law, of the city of Washington, D. C., for the amount of compensation which shall be paid to the attorneys who have performed services as counsel on behalf of said Indians in the prosecution of the claim of said Indians for payment for said land, and in determining the amount of compensation for such services the court may consider all contracts or agreements heretofore entered into by said Indians with attorneys who have represented them in the prosecution of said claim, and also all services rendered by said attorneys for said Indians in the matter of said claim. Petition hereunder shall be filed in said court by the said attorneys (Butler & Vale) within thirty days from the passage of this act, and the Attorney-General shall appear on behalf of the defendants, and said cause shall be given preference for immediate hearing in said court, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay the sum of money so awarded by said court to the said attorneys (Butler & Vale) upon the rendition of final judgment, out of the said sum herein set apart or appropriated for the benefit of said Indians, and payment of said judgment shall be in full compensation to all attorneys who have rendered services to said Indians in the matter of their said claim, the same to be apportioned among said attorneys by said Butler & Vale as agreed among themselves: Provided, That before any money is paid to any attorney having an agreement with Butler & Vale as to the distribution of said fees each of the same shall execute and deliver to the Secretary of the Interior a satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands for services rendered said Indians in the matter of their said claim;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate inserted a provision here providing for the payment to the Indians of one million and a half dollars, and appropriated $150,000 as a first installment. The conferees report back here an absolutely new and distinct matter, not mentioned in the bill as passed by the House, never considered by either House, a matter belonging in fact to the Committee on Claims of this body, and we are asked to authorize this suit to begin in the Court of Claims in behalf of these two lawyers—Marion Butler, formerly a Senator in this Chamber, and Vale. The whole thing is so extraordinary that I can not see how the conferees, considering the powers and limitations upon conference committees, can usurp the functions of the Committee on Claims and put in motion the instrumentality by which these lawyers shall be paid $150,000 from the funds of these Indians without Congress having ever heard of it.

While it may be not subject to the point of order as being new matter entirely, it is absolutely out of the jurisdiction of the conference committee, as I take it, to insert into the bill a provision authorizing a claim to be put into the Court of Claims for the setting apart, if judgment shall be found, of some of this Indian money. I should like to have an explanation of it, Mr. President, if anybody is ready to offer it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, it is quite common in the Indian appropriation bills to appropriate money directly to attorneys and by name. In this particular case the Government entered into an agreement with these Indians by the terms of which, if the Indians should lease a million and a half acres of land, the Government would pay them a million and a half dollars, a dollar an acre. That was a part of the agreement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who made the agreement?

Mr. DUBOIS. Officers of the Government made it with the Indians. Congress ratified all the agreement, taking the lands from the Indians. They took the lands and disposed of the lands, but they did not ratify the part paying the Indians the million and a half dollars which they had agreed to pay.

The Indians then employed counsel. They made a contract with Maish and Gordon agreeing to give them 15 per cent of the million and a half dollars if they recovered it. The Department approved that contract, cutting it down, however, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent, and these attorneys worked diligently. The bill passed the Senate two years ago, and I am not sure but that it passed before that time. It failed to pass both branches of Congress and this contract expired by limitation, being a ten years' contract.

The attorneys then, through some Washington attorneys also, who became interested in it, made a new contract with these Indians for 10 per cent. The attorneys showed that they had worked diligently, and it was perfectly plain to the committee that if it had not been for the attorneys the Indians would never have gotten the million and a half dollars which the Government agreed to pay them.

Even this last summer the Government sent its agents out there to make another contract with these same Colville Indians for the relinquishment of a million and a half acres more of their lands, but the Indians only made this new agreement with the express provision, which was put in the new agreement, that they should be paid the million and a half dollars which the Government had been owing them all these years.

The evidence before the committee showed conclusively, as I said, the services performed by these attorneys, and the committee thought it was the least it could do in fairness to send the matter to the Court of Claims to let the Court of Claims determine, on the facts what these attorneys are entitled to receive.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DUBOIS. As I said, time and time again, under circumstances not nearly so clear and plain as these, Congress has put in the Indian appropriation bill a direct appropriation to pay money to attorneys by name.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. If this appropriation were a righteous, a just, and a legitimate one, why was it not included in the Senate amendments when the Senate had the bill under consideration? Why was it necessary to put the bill into conference and then have this recognition, and passing upon and reference to the Court of Claims made by the committee of conference rather than by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. DUBOIS. Perhaps that was due to the negligence of the attorneys, or perhaps they relied upon the committee to insert it. We knew about their claim, and we failed to insert it. After the bill passed, the attorneys made the presentation and the committee thought there would be no objection on the part of the Senate, the facts being set forth, to allowing the Court of Claims to determine on the facts in regard to the attorneys' fees.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why was the $150,000 appropriated in the Senate amendment stricken out and this recommendation of the claim of these lawyers put in instead of it?

Mr. DUBOIS. The $150,000 that was stricken out has nothing to do with it.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it has nothing to do with it, then it seems that we have no use for committees. There is $1,500,000 of this fund in the hands of the Government. The first payment provided for in the Senate amendment is simply a recognition of the obligation of the debt, to set aside the money in the Treasury for the use of these Indians, and then to appropriate $150,000 for their immediate use. But, instead of letting that stand as the Senate put it in the bill, the Senate conferees insert a provision sending to the Court of Claims the claim of these lawyers for services rendered. I ask why not let that go to the Committee on Claims like any other claim?

Mr. DUBOIS. Because I do not think, as a rule, that such claims go to the Committee on Claims. Such a reference would be unprecedented.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Where the claim is a claim against the Indians and not against the Government, I think it has been the universal custom—it certainly has in the brief time I have been in the Senate—to deal with such matters through the Indian Committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then why did not the Indian Committee put this in instead of the conference committee doing it?

Mr. CLAPP. The Claims Committee would have nothing to do with a claim of this kind. The Claims Committee considers claims against the United States Government. You will find where there have been Indian claims which have reached a position where it is thought advisable to send them to the Court of Claims or to make a direct appropriation for them, the universal custom has been for the Committee on Indian Affairs to deal with them, because that committee deals with the affairs of the Indians, whilst the Claims Committee deals with claims against the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. What I complain of, Mr. President, is that, instead of the Indian Committee sitting as a committee, examining into this matter, having all the facts brought out, and inserting this in the ordinary and legitimate way, they did not touch it; but the conference committee, after the bill got through the Senate and the amount of $150,000 was appropriated for the immediate use of the Indians, hatches up this entirely new stuff and puts it into the conference report, knowing that it is the custom of the Senate to trust its committees and to adopt conference reports almost always without objection.

Mr. CLAPP. Since the Senator, then, has abandoned his first criticism, that this matter ought to have gone to the Committee on Claims——

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not abandoned it altogether.

Mr. CLAPP. The object of a conference is to bring together the two Houses and reconcile their differences. Everything that is added in conference, no matter how absolutely and completely it is within the scope of the conference, comes there after the bill has passed the respective Houses. The fact that this amendment was put on in the Senate shows that it had not reached that point where the House of Representatives would consider it at that time. These things as they grow go on and develop. After this amendment was put on in the Senate it went into conference. There was this claim of these parties, and it seemed to the conferees—and it was clearly the sense of the House conferees, who had much more experience in this matter than the chairman of the Senate conferees has had—that it was within the limit of the authority of the conferees. This claim was pending, and it seemed to the conferees that it was better to send it to the Court of Claims and have it settled one way or other.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was pending, but it had not been considered by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs; it had not been considered by the House Committee on Indian Affairs; it had not been put on in the Senate; and yet the conferees—six men—take out the $150,000 item which was put in by the Senate in this amendment, and insert instead the provision that the Court of Claims shall consider this claim; that it shall give it precedence, and apportion the money through the instrumentality of Mr. Marion Butler and Mr. Vale if judgment is rendered.

Mr. CLAPP. As to the instrumentalities, the evidence was very clear that those gentlemen had authority to deal with this entire matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. What did the Commissioner of Indian Affairs have to say about this?

Mr. CLAPP. He had nothing whatever to say about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it ordinary, is it proper, for a conference committee, without authority or without consulting with those in charge of Indian affairs and trying to protect them, to take this matter in hand and transfer to the Court of Claims a provision of this sort for a claim of this kind and put it into a conference report, rather than to present it to the Senate in the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. CLAPP. Inasmuch as the important matter of sending claims to the Court of Claims is not within the purview of the Indian Department, it would hardly be expected that this matter would be suggested by or referred to that department. This was a matter for Congress to settle.

The Senate amendment provided that $150,000 should be appropriated for the benefit of these Indians. We provide in this amendment, as reported from the conference committee, for expediting this matter in the hope, at least, that by the time Congress meets next winter they will have settled this matter in the Court of Claims, and then we can close up the affairs of the Colville Indians. That was our reason for putting it in.

Mr. TILLMAN. The trouble with it is that all the Senate amendment did, as I understand, was to recognize the debt of the Colville Indians and set apart $1,500,000 to be paid to them as occasion arises and as necessity appears; but, instead of doing that, the Senate conferees struck out the provision for $150,000 set apart or appropriated in the Senate amendment and inserted in lieu thereof a provision looking to the lawyers getting $150,000 instead of the Indians.

Mr. CLAPP. The provision looks to having the lawyers get whatever the court may say they are entitled to; and I submit if they are entitled to anything, they should get it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The point is rather whether it is within the legitimate function and power of the conferees to do this thing.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. Where did the original matter touching this subject originate—in the House or in the Senate?

Mr. CLAPP. In the Senate.

Mr. HALE. In what way did it originate?

Mr. TILLMAN. I just read it. I will read it again for the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I was temporarily out of the Chamber.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is on page 161 of the Indian appropriation bill printed with Senate amendments numbered. I will read it again. It is not very long:

To carry into effect the agreement bearing date May 9, 1891, entered into between the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation and commissioners appointed by the President of the United States under authority of the act of Congress approved August 19, 1890, to negotiate with the Colville and other bands of Indians on said Colville Reservation for the cession of such portion of said reservation as said Indians might be willing to dispose of, there shall be set aside and held in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of said Indians, which shall at all times be subject to the appropriation of Congress and payment to said Indians, in full payment for 1,500,000 acres of land opened to settlement by the act of Congress "To provide for the opening of a part of the Colville Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1892, the sum of $1,500,000, of which sum $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the benefit of said Indians.

It seems, therefore, that some years ago commissioners of the United States went to these Indians and bought their lands, but they did not pay them immediately.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask him is it not true that when this land was purchased the law provided that the funds should be held in the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians, and only should be paid out by an act of Congress?

Mr. TILLMAN. By an act of Congress. That is what I judge from the context.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not also true that this money has been held in the Treasury all the while and that the Indians have not received it simply because there has been no appropriation made for it, and in all probability Congress thought it was not best to appropriate? Why was it necessary to have lawyers or anybody else to go and secure the payment of an honest, straight debt of the United States?

Mr. TILLMAN. That I have been unable to discover.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator, right there, will pardon me a moment, both Senators are mistaken. The Government did agree, at least that seems to be the settled conviction now, to pay these Indians $1,500,000 for their land; but the Government never did agree, and the Government never has recognized that claim to this day. There is a bill pending in Congress ratifying a treaty with those Indians, whereby they agree to cede the south half of the reservation, at a dollar an acre, I think, to be paid for as sold by the Government on condition that they get this $1,500,000. Congress passed that law without the condition; and to-day there is not a scrap of law on the statute book of the United States that recognizes the claim of those Indians. It is part of the history of this matter and the experience of members of the Committee on Indian Affairs that this claim has been pressed by these men for years.

Mr. TILLMAN. Pressed where?

Mr. CLAPP. Pressed before the committees of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. And yet the Indian Affairs Committee, which had the preparation of the Indian appropriation bill, did not see fit to insert in that bill the provision that the claim should go to the Court of Claims, but the conferees have done it.

Mr. CLAPP. That is very true. When we went into conference and studied this matter over, it seemed to us that between now and next December it would be better to settle this matter once for all.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CLAPP. I am talking by the courtesy of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to know what these lawyers had to do with this matter, so that they should be paid $150,000?

Mr. CLAPP. They do not get $150,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems to me they get 10 or 15 per cent of the amount to be paid the Indians. I want to know for what they get it?

Mr. CLAPP. They had a contract for 10 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, 10 per cent on $1,500,000 is $150,000.

Mr. CLAPP. That was the contract that existed at that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. To do what?

Mr. CLAPP. To prosecute these claims.

Mr. OVERMAN. To prosecute them where?

Mr. CLAPP. In the Department and in Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. To come up here before Congress and before the Departments and get $150,000?

Mr. CLAPP. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars due different tribes of Indians in this country to-day, and it is impossible to get them paid. If they had no attorneys to appear for them they would not get these things.

Mr. TILLMAN. The trouble about it is the lawyers get it and the Indians never see it.

Mr. HALE. What I am troubled about is this: Here seem to be rights or equities that this tribe has against the Government. A provision is passed by the Senate recognizing that right of these Indians to a certain extent and appropriating $150,000 in recognition of that right. The conference committee can only justify inserting here the claim for attorneys upon the proposition that it is a part of the transaction with the Indians, and that in the transaction the Indians ought to pay their attorneys for services. But it is going very far, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. What evidence have we that that is the situation? What evidence is there that the attorneys have any claim?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did not the Supreme Court decide at its last term that such contracts are against public policy and in the nature of lobbying?

Mr. HALE. I thought I had the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the Senator had yielded. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HALE. I was trying to bring out what is in my mind; but in the practice here in the Senate no man can do that. He is interrupted and taken off his feet, and then the interrupter yields to somebody else, and that interrupter yields to a third interrupter, and no human thought here is consecutive; it is utterly impossible to project any line of thought a Senator may have into a discussion of this kind.

I say that the conferees had no right to take this claim of the attorneys and put it in; it makes no difference whether they put it in the shape of an appropriation or send it to the Court of Claims. It is a question whether they have put into it new matter which was not considered by either House, and unless it is a part of the transaction and connected with it, on which the Senate acted in putting the amendment on the appropriation bill—and as to that I do not know—if that is the ground the conferees take, it clearly raises a question.

The conferees, I think, would have been much wiser if they had let it go and let the Committee on Indian Affairs at some time report that this claim ought to be paid out of these funds. It is doubtful at least—I do not say so for certain, as I am not sufficiently apprised of all the facts to know—and if it is a part of the transaction and a part of the claim the conferees had a right to consider it as much as they had to consider the $150,000 appropriated for the tribe itself. That is a question which I do not know about. But I do not think that the conferees ought to have stretched their authority to introduce new matter unless they were very confident about that. I do not think the fact that they propose to send the claim to the Court of Claims cuts a figure at all in the question. It is just as bad to introduce an appropriation, if it is new matter, as it is to introduce a proposition that a claim shall be sent to the Court of Claims. The question how it is done does not cut any figure. It is a question whether—and I hate to repeat it—this was so connected with the whole transaction which the Senate introduced in this amendment that the conferees had a right to put this in as a part of that transaction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] before I came in explained the matter of the obtaining of this concession from the Indians by the Government, and fully explained the debt due from the United States to this Indian tribe. The only other question is whether we have inserted new matter in the conference report.

There can be no question but that $1,500,000 is due the Indians. Both the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate are satisfied that were it not for the efforts of attorneys for now almost fifteen years this proposition would never have been before the Senate in the shape it now is. Therefore there was a provision made, as I understand, in the bill when it passed the Senate appropriating $150,000 immediately. What was that for? What was the object of appropriating that $150,000, which was made immediately available? These attorneys and other attorneys had first a contract for 15 per cent. That contract was ratified by the Secretary of the Interior at 10 per cent. They worked for some ten full years under that. That contract expired, and they entered into a new contract, which was never ratified. Under the new contract the attorneys expected undoubtedly that out of this $150,000, which is made immediately available for payment to those Indians, they would get the same provision whereby that would be turned over to them as their fee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one word more, and then I will allow the Senator to do so.

When the matter came again before the committee of conference, the question of the value of these attorneys' fees was gone into very thoroughly and the names and the number of persons who had acted at attorneys in the matter, and it was made clear to the committee that not more than $15,000 out of any sum, no matter what should be recovered, even if the full amount should be recovered, could go to any one attorney or firm of attorneys, as appears by the testimony. But it was thought by the House members and by the Senate members of the conference committee that it was best, instead of taking that $150,000 and paying it over to those Indians who had signed the contract and who, as soon as they had received it, would undoubtedly comply with their contract if the agents were on hand, we made a provision that if there was doubt as to the value of those attorneys' fees, in no possible way could they be over $150,000—that we had better let the court take testimony and say whether or not the sum was reasonable; then take its findings of fact, and refer the matter again to the Senate next year, when we could take the testimony that was obtained by the Court of Claims, and then determine ourselves whether the judgment of the Court of Claims was reasonable and proper.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator now allow me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not understand the Senator's statement in the light of the Senate amendment on page 161. That amendment reads:

To carry into effect the agreement bearing date May 9, 1891.

That agreement was reached, if I understand, by commissioners appointed by the Government to buy these Indian lands?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yet the Senator talks about an agreement made fifteen years ago by the Indians with some lawyers to collect a claim. It is only five years ago. How does the Senator explain the contradiction?

Mr. McCUMBER. Between what?

Mr. TILLMAN. I say the language of this amendment on page 161 is:

To carry into effect the agreement bearing date May 9, 1891.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was made in 1891. That is fifteen years ago, is it not?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, that is true. I was thinking of 1901.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. DUBOIS. I can answer, I think, the Senator's question. Congress failed to ratify that part of the agreement to pay the Indians a million and a half of dollars; so, in 1894, three years afterwards, they employed these attorneys.

Mr. TILLMAN. To do what?

Mr. DUBOIS. To come to Congress and present their claim and try and secure its payment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator say that Congress paid the Indians a million and a half and then would not do anything more about it?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes; I do very positively.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is exactly what was done.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is only on a parity with the policy which has been heretofore pursued. They not only stole the land, but stole the money after it was appropriated to buy it.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is about all I wanted to explain to the Senate. The Committee on Indian Affairs has had some experience in getting through treaties. No matter how good or how just a treaty may be, it will oftentimes take ten to twelve years to get it through the Senate and through the other House.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I understand the Senator to mean that the "$150,000 hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the benefit of said Indians," was not designed to be paid over to these lawyers, and the conferees discovered that that probably would be illegal and that they could not get their money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; the Senator certainly could not have so understood me. The money will be appropriated and paid to the Indians. These Indians had made a contract, which might be good as between the Indians and the attorneys, to pay this $150,000, and that contract was signed by their leading men. If the attorneys had had their agents there when that money was paid over to the Indians, in all probability they would have got the full amount, according to the contract.

The conferees, after due deliberation—the House not agreeing to the amendment placed in the bill by the Senate—thought that this ought to be modified in such a manner that the Court of Claims should determine what would be a reasonable attorneys' fee, and that no appropriation should be made to pay the attorneys' fee until we found the amount which would be necessary.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I understand the Senator to state that this land was purchased by the Government of the United States for $1,500,000. Congress did not pay for it; then the Indians employed counsel, and made contracts with the counsel for the purpose of recovering the sum due them, and agreed in the contract that the compensation should be 10 per cent of the amount recovered?

Mr. McCUMBER. Fifteen per cent in the first place.

Mr. CLAY. Yes; I understand that was the original contract; but the Secretary of the Interior declined to approve that contract. Then they made a second contract with the attorneys and agreed to pay them 10 per cent of the recovery, and the Secretary of the Interior approved that contract.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator seems to have forgotten one thing, and that is, there were two halves to this Indian Reservation.

Mr. CLAY. I understand that.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that one half was taken at a certain price, with the understanding that the Government should take the other half at a certain price. The Government took the first half, and since then has never done anything toward taking the other portion and paying for it. That is the proposition.

Mr. CLAY. I understand that. They entered into a contract for certain fees for the recovery of this money. The contract specially provided that the counsel were to proceed to recover this money in a certain length of time. I ask the Senator, Is it not true that nothing was done; that the contract expired; that it was at an end, and then Congress itself took this matter up and provided for the payment of this claim? Is not this simply to refer this case to the Court of Claims to determine whether or not these attorneys shall be paid a certain sum of money, regardless of that contract, after that contract has expired? The contract specially provided that the money must be recovered within a certain time; otherwise the contract was to be void. The contract came to an end, Congress took the matter up, investigated it, and appropriated this money. Now, this is an effort to permit these people to go to the Court of Claims to get this money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, let the Senator look at the equity part of it. We will say that good, honest attorneys entered into a contract with their clients to take 10 per cent of a claim which they would prosecute to completion. They worked on it for ten years. In four years they had the matter before Congress fully completed; but Congress refused to do its duty and to make the payment until after the contract had expired. Then, after the attorneys had put in their work for all of these years, Congress by its own act practically let the contract lapse by reason of length of time. Notwithstanding that contract could not be enforced, nor the subsequent contract—because there was a subsequent contract, which, so far as the Indians are concerned, is in force to-day, although it has not received the approbation of the Secretary of the Interior—the attorneys have gone right on with their work; they have completed the work, and they will have secured, when we get through with this bill, what they started out to secure; and in equity the conferees thought, and the Senate committee in the first instance intended, that the attorneys should be paid a reasonable attorney's fee.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he has read those contracts?

Mr. McCUMBER. If I have read the contracts?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; has he seen the contracts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I have. It has been before the committee a great many times, and I can recall the particular contract. The contract expired, of course, at the expiration of——

Mr. SPOONER. Where were the services to be rendered—in court?

Mr. McCUMBER. They were to be rendered in securing not only the action of the Department, which was necessary in the first instance, but to secure this claim for the Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. To procure the passage of a bill through Congress?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, to follow it through Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. To secure the passage of a bill through Congress?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that included in the contract?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not recall the exact words. Possibly the Senator from Idaho can give the information.

Mr. CLAY (to Mr. SPOONER). I have sent for the contract.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from North Dakota says the services to be rendered were services to be performed before the head of the Department and also in Congress in getting through this claim. If that is true, the contract is absolutely void, and it has been so held for a hundred years, as being against public policy. In the case of Hazelton v. Miller, decided April 23, 1906, by the Supreme Court of the United States, the court says:

The bill alleges that a part of the consideration for the contract "was services rendered both before and after the making of said contract by the plaintiff in bringing the property to the attention of the committees of Congress as a suitable and appropriate site for a hall of records." It sets forth that the plaintiff, before and after the same date, expended much time, labor, and money in rendering those services, and what they were, viz, collecting and printing facts for the information of the committees and Members of Congress, making briefs and arguments, and drawing a bill for the purchase or condemnation of the square.

They declared the contract void, as against public policy; and in concluding their opinion the court say:

The general principle was laid down broadly in Tool Company v. Norris (2 Wall., 45, 54), that an agreement for compensation to procure a contract from the Government to furnish its supplies could not be enforced irrespective of the question whether improper means were contemplated or used for procuring it. (McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S., 639, 648.) And it was said that there is no real difference in principle between agreements to procure favors from legislative bodies, and agreements to procure favors in the shape of contracts from the heads of Departments. (2 Wall., 55.)

In Marshall v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad (16 How., 314, 336), it was said that all contracts for a contingent compensation for obtaining legislation were void, citing, among other cases, Clippinger v. Hepbaugh (5 W. and S., 315) and Wood v. McCann (6 Danna (Ky.), 366). (See also Mills v. Mills, 40 N. Y., 543.) There are other objections which would have to be answered before the bill could be sustained, but that which we have stated goes to the root of the contract and is enough to dispose of the case under the decisions heretofore made.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not know the circumstances of the case which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has just cited, but I do know that nothing is commoner than the payment of fees to lawyers who make contracts for services which are rendered entirely by arguments in the Departments and before committees of Congress. Within the last three years there was a claim of the State of Massachusetts in connection with the late war. It was one of a series of State claims. There was nothing really to be done but to determine the amount and liquidate it at the Treasury Department. A very improvident contract was made—there was some doubt about its legality—by which the attorney was to have 10 per cent on the payment made to the State. The amount of the debt of the United States to the State of Massachusetts was one million six hundred and odd thousand dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury turned over a check for $1,640,000, I think it was, to the attorney. He never had done anything except to argue the case before the Treasury Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was it not for the full amount?

Mr. LODGE. He turned over the check for $1,640,000 to the attorney. The check was drawn payable to the governor of the Commonwealth. There was some doubt about the lawfulness of the contract. The State was entirely prepared to pay all that was proper, and when it was assessed, no matter how improvident the contract was, she was prepared to fulfill it. An effort was made in court to get that check, which could only have been cashed by the governor of the Commonwealth, and the courts refused.

Now, all that was done by that attorney, as I have said, was to make an argument as to the liquidation of this claim, as to the amount. There was not any doubt about the claim. Similar claims had been paid to other States. It was a mere matter of liquidation, and all the work in Congress was done by the representatives of the State in either House in getting the bill through. In fact, after it was liquidated and certified by the Secretary of the Treasury, there was very little trouble in getting it through. The courts would not compel the attorney to give up to the Commonwealth that check for $1,640,000, and the Commonwealth finally had to pay him the fee of $160,000 in order to get the money that was due it. There are other States which have had the same experience, I am sure.

It is idle to say that attorneys are not paid, and properly paid, when the amount is reasonable, for work done in the Departments and before the committees of Congress for the recovery of claims.

I have broken in on the Senator from North Dakota. I was going to say something about the character of this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would rather the Senator would go on.

Mr. LODGE. I want to say a word in regard to this amendment. This amendment, as it passed the Senate, was to appropriate $150,000, to be immediately available, for the benefit of those Indians, and I understood at the time, and I think other Senators understood, too, that that sum or a portion of it was to be used to settle the claims which these attorneys had in equity undoubtedly upon the Indians for the work they had performed.

Now, in dealing with that appropriation, which was made for the benefit of the Indians, the conference committee has provided how the amount shall be determined, and they have done what seems to me to be for the protection of the Indians. They have left it to the court to assess what the proper fee is. I wish we could have had a court assess the value of the work done for the State of Massachusetts in securing the payment of the claim to which I have already referred. It seems to me the committee has acted in that way out of an abundance of caution.

The Senator from Maine said he was very doubtful whether this could be construed as new matter. I think there may be some doubt, but it seems to me clear that it was within their province, when dealing with an appropriation of this character, to say how the appropriation should be disposed of or what process should be adopted in settling any claim against the fund appropriated. It seems to me that if we take points of order made in the other House on similar questions, on which I have heard rulings many times, we will find that it is always in order to attach to an appropriation an instruction as to how the money shall be spent or under what restrictions it shall be expended by the Government. I think the clause is in order, moreover, and on its merits, it seems to me, the committee acted with the greatest possible caution. If any point of order would lie, I am inclined to think the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] made it when he said that part of these fees, if they were assessed by the court, would be paid to our former colleague in this body, ex-Senator Marion Butler.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. One reason why the conferees preferred to send this to the Court of Claims instead of disposing of it here was that the court might pass upon all these questions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the court pass upon the question whether the contract was void?

Mr. CLAPP. They have to pass on that question. You can not recover a judgment in a court on a void contract.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I think it is very clearly against public policy for Congress to recognize in any way, directly or indirectly, claims of this character. As I understand the situation, after listening with considerable attention to the various statements that have been made upon the subject, it amounts to this: Somewhere about 1890 or 1891 the United States entered into a contract with a certain Indian tribe, by which it obligated itself to pay that tribe one million and a half of dollars. So if the Government was honest, and stood to carry out its contract with the Indians, there was nothing that the United States could do through its Department or through Congress but to make arrangements for the payment of the money.

I can not conceive what duties these attorneys would perform in dealing with the Department which would entitle them to compensation, if it was the plain, unqualified duty of the Department to do what was necessary upon its part to get to the Indians the money that belonged to them. It was a plain, unqualified contractual obligation. There were no damages to be assessed. Everything was liquidated. It was all a matter of contract.

Now, can it be said that it is wise policy upon the part of Congress to recognize a claim, even under a contract with a claimant, the consideration of which is to induce an officer of the Government, or one of the great Departments of the Government, to do its plain duty to a citizen or to an Indian tribe? If there was any room for controversy—and I understand there was none in this case—if there was any unsettled question to be disposed of, if there was any light to be thrown upon the intelligence of the head of the Department, then perhaps somebody would earn something in performing the duty that would shed the light or convey the information. But if a system of this kind is to be adopted, what have we? The head of the Department omitting to do his duty; an attorney collecting a claim, simply to stir the head of the Department to do his duty, about the doing of which there is absolutely no room for controversy, no real light to be shed, no real argument to be made, no real duty to be performed.

Now, then, when we come to Congress, what was the duty of Congress? The duty of Congress was to make the appropriation, and the Supreme Court of the United States has well declared that contracts for the payment of services of that character are against public policy and should not be enforced, either in courts of law or courts of equity.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Revised Statutes do not declare it against public policy, because they provide for making contracts with the Indians for just such purposes. But the statute contains a provision that the Secretary of the Interior shall agree to such contracts.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to his colleague?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in this case the contract was approved by the Department. Then, I want to call his attention to the fact, which I will later bring to the attention of the Senate, that it was a disputed question whether the Indians owned the land and whether they ought to have any pay for it.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Colorado——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I can not see how there can be any dispute or how any dispute could have arisen about the fact that this money was due to the Indians by the Government of the United States. I hold in my hand the agreement between the Indians and our Commissioners, and that agreement especially says:

The said Colville Indians, residing and having their homes on the said Colville Indian Reservation upon the conditions hereinafter expressed, do hereby surrender and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, claim, and interest in and to and over the following-described tract of country on the Colville Indian Reservation in the State of Washington.

Turn to article 5, and it provides:

That in consideration of the cession, surrender, and relinquishment to the United States of all the title, claim, right, estate, and interest of said Indians in and to the tract of land above described, the United States will pay to the said Indians, the beneficiaries of this agreement, to be distributed per capita, the sum of $1,500,000, payable in five annual installments of $300,000 each, with interest thereon at 5 per cent after this agreement shall take effect.

Now, here is a solemn agreement on the part of the United States to pay this money, and why any counsel should be needed for the purpose of enforcing this contract, or why Congress should doubt a minute that this was a legal claim against our Government, I am unable to understand. Here is a solemn contract, signed by our Commissioners and signed by those representing the Indians, agreeing upon the amount of land that was conveyed to our Government and the price to be paid. It was clearly a legal and valid claim against the Government of the United States, and expressed by contract in writing and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to his colleague?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. If my colleague will yield a moment, I will say to the Senator from Georgia that it was not a contract until Congress recognized it as a contract. The Secretary of the Interior has no authority to approve it. It lacked that recognition and it lacks it to this day. I desire to explain this matter somewhat when my colleague gets through. I can not do it at this time.

Mr. PATTERSON. In the light of the statement made by the Senator and my lack of information, except what I have gathered during the discussion, I would a great deal rather defer any remarks that I may make until I hear from my colleague, because I have gone upon the theory up to this time that it was a plain contractual obligation; the contract made; the lands relinquished to the Government; the obligation resting upon the United States to fulfill its part of the contract. If such was the case, I can well understand how a delinquent head of a Department might imagine for a purpose obstacles in the way, and some friendly attorney enter into a very large contract with the Indians in order to remove that imaginary obstacle. I can imagine that. I have not the slightest idea that such a thing occurred. But I can well understand that it might, and for that reason, if the basis of my remarks should prove to be true, I have no hesitation in saying that a contract for services of that character is against public policy, and Congress should have nothing whatever to do with enforcing it.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The suggestion regarding the head of a Department would apply to Congress; it would apply to the House of Representatives, which this very winter, if I remember correctly, refused to recognize this, although coupled with a proposition of the Indians to cede the other half of their reservation.

Mr. PATTERSON. I had reference only to the head of a Department, and that as a mere possibility; but the presumption should always be that Congress, so far as contractual obligations are concerned, will perform its duty. If it should become the custom of Congress to fail to perform its duty until some ex-Senator or ex-Representative or private attorney appeared upon the scene for the purpose of inciting Congress to activity, it would be a very poor policy indeed, and one the country would resent.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I should like to ask why it is any more necessary to have lawyers to collect contractual obligations of the Government to the Indians than it is to have lawyers employed to collect the interest on the public debt or any other debt of the United States?

Mr. PATTERSON. If there is any——

Mr. TILLMAN. Our bonds are contracts. Does anybody have to go to the Court of Claims to collect the interest on his bonds?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have discovered since I have been in the Senate that there are two classes who are either required to pay great fees or voluntarily pay great fees—the great corporations of the country and the Indian tribes. If an attorney happens to have relations with a great corporation, he can earn a hundred-thousand-dollar fee; if he happens to have business relations with an Indian tribe, one single fee will enable him to retire from business and to set himself up as a millionaire in prospect.

I notice that some Senators, who stand guard, with bayonet on their rifles, over the public Treasury in behalf of the people, the dear people—I would use the term "dear," but that it might be presumed that I am sarcastic, which I am not—have no hesitation, with voice and energy and influence, in urging steps to be taken to compel an Indian tribe to pay enough to set up the head of a principality for services that are not in reality legal services, but for services that are simply services of influence, if I may use that term.

Mr. TILLMAN. Lobbying, in other words.

Mr. PATTERSON. Because certain persons happen to have a pull in some direction or great powers of persuasion to induce people to do their plain duty, they are able to secure for services of this character enormous sums of money.

Now, services such as are said to have been rendered in this case, if I am correctly informed, are not legal services at all. It does not require a lawyer to perform them. A man with a glib tongue and with persuasive powers, with friends at court, can do just as much as a lawyer, though he may never have read a page of a statute or a section of Blackstone in bringing about settlements for their so-called "clients" in cases of this kind. They are not legal services. They are services that either should not be rendered or, if rendered at all, should be rendered as acts of friendship from a sense of duty, and not upon the theory——

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said this would have to be approved by Congress. I find that Congress has approved it.

Articles of agreement made and entered into on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1891, at the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, by Mark A. Fullerton, W. H. H. Dufur, and James F. Payne, commissioners on the part of the United States appointed for the purpose, and the Indians residing on said reservation.

Then setting forth the agreement, it proceeds:

Therefore,
Be it enacted, etc., That said agreement be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

Mr. PATTERSON. What is the date of that?

Mr. CLAY. 1891.

Articles of agreement made and entered into on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1891, at the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, by Mark A. Fullerton, W. H. H. Dufur, and James F. Payne, commissioners on the part of the United States appointed for the purpose, and the Indians residing on said reservation.

ARTICLE 1. The said Colville Indians residing and having their homes on the said Colville Indian Reservation, upon the conditions hereinafter expressed, do hereby surrender and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, claim, and interest in and to and over the following-described tract of country on the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington,

I will get the date directly. The Indians have all signed it—by their mark mostly. The commissioners first signed it, and then the Indians signed it.

Mr. TELLER. What did Congress do about it?

Mr. CLAY. Congress ratified and approved it.

Mr. TELLER. Congress has not paid the money.

Mr. CLAY. I did not say that. Congress ought to have paid the money. It was clearly a debt against the Government of the United States, and I do not see how there can be any doubt about it. Here is a copy of the act of Congress:

Therefore,
Be it enacted, etc., That said agreement be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.
SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the terms and stipulations of said agreement the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

That is the act of Congress itself.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the date of that? When was it approved?

Mr. CLAY. I do not see the date, but I will find it in a minute.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will permit me, the act of Congress which opened a part of the reservation became a law July 1, 1892.

Mr. PATTERSON. Congress did ratify the agreement by act of Congress and the land was opened to the public.

Mr. CLAY. This is dated December 26, 1891.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator had read the evidence of the efforts for fifteen years to get Congress to pay for this land, he would realize that somebody had done some work. It is equally true, perhaps, that Congress has not done its duty.

Mr. PATTERSON. What obstacle was there in the way of making the appropriation, will the chairman of the committee inform us?

Mr. CLAPP. Because it was difficult to make the committees and Congress and the House this winter recognize the claim of these Colville Indians. The Senator from Washington who retired last March I think attempted twice, once I am very certain, to get the Senate to recognize that obligation, and he was unable to do it. The effort has been made repeatedly in one House or the other, but Congress would not, and up to this hour has not done it.

Mr. PATTERSON. What inspiration in the end did influence Congress to do a duty that was so plain?

Mr. CLAPP. The constant presentation of the evidence of the merits of the claim of these Indians.

Mr. PATTERSON. The constant presentation of the plain letter and obligation of a contract.

Mr. CLAPP. Not at all.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is all I see which could have been done.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. PILES. I think I can explain this matter to the Senator from Colorado. An arrangement was made, as I understand, with the Indians with reference to the northern half of the Colville Indian Reservation by which the Indians agreed to surrender to the Government the north half of that reservation in consideration of certain lands which were to be allotted to the Indians and the payment of $1,500,000. This $1,500,000 it was supposed the Government would raise by the sale of the unallotted land. The Government took possession of the north half of the reservation and allotted certain lands to the Indians and it threw the remainder of the north half open to settlement at a dollar and a half an acre, I think it was. Subsequently Congress repealed the law requiring setlers to pay a dollar and a half an acre for the land which they had taken, holding that inasmuch as other homesteaders had received their homes free it would be unjust to require homesteaders on the north half of this Indian reservation to pay for their homes.

Subsequently, as I understand it, the contention was made that the Colville Indian Reservation was not, as a matter of fact, the land of the Indians; that they were in possession of the reservation by virtue of an Executive order, and they had no title to the land.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, so far as that claim is concerned, that was all wiped out by the terms of the agreement itself, because it is nothing more than a quit claim so far as the agreement is concerned; we sell all the right and title and nothing more.

Mr. PILES. To the Indians?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. PILES. I am endeavoring to show why these Indians had to employ lawyers to prosecute their claim. My recollection is that one of the judges in the circuit court of the United States in my State held that the Indians did not have title to lands because they had been sent on the reservation by Executive order.

Now, there came a great pressure upon Congress from the people of the State of Washington to open the south half of the reservation to settlement, because it is one of the most beautiful and fertile countries in the world. I myself have traveled over it and know whereof I speak. The Indians were unwilling to cede the south half of the reservation until their brother Indians on the north half were paid what they claimed to be their just right, $1,500,000, and they refused to consent to the opening of the south half until the money was paid.

In the meantime the Indians employed lawyers in my State, gentlemen of great ability, to represent them and see if they could not get the Government to pay them the $1,500,000. They had been raising the question here, there, and everywhere that they were entitled to this money, and that they owned this land, notwithstanding the Executive order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Washington yield for a question?

Mr. PILES. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume that the north half, which we did agree to buy, is equally as fertile and beautiful as the Senator says the south half is.

Mr. PILES. I think it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yet we force the Indians to employ lawyers to get a pitiful dollar and a half an acre for land which we gave to these men.

Mr. PILES. To get a dollar and a half an acre.

Mr. TILLMAN. And here is a treaty signed by the commissioners of the United States and the Indian chiefs, which the Senator from Georgia has just quoted, and the Government ratified it through Congress and we were to pay a dollar and a half for lands which the white men of Washington occupy and want, and when they want the other half, and the Indian says, "I will not sell you the land until you pay for the other," it took lawyers to collect it.

Mr. PILES. No; it did not take any lawyers to collect it. These lawyers had already been employed.

Now, Mr. President, this is not singular. This is not a peculiar case. Fifty years ago this Government took from the Indians in my State a tract of land greater than all New England, which the Indians ceded to the Government.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PILES. Fifty years the Government agreed in consideration of that cession.

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not yield to the Senator for a speech.

Mr. PILES. I do not wish to occupy the Senator's time, but I wanted to make a statement.

Mr. PATTERSON. And really the Senator has made it.

Mr. PILES. I wanted to show how the Indians have been deprived of their rights in certain instances, and have been compelled to employ counsel to assert those rights.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not profess to have knowledge from a personal investigation of any duties that might be legitimately or necessarily required in order to bring about a settlement with the Indians for the sum of money that the Government agreed to pay. I have no knowledge of the legal or other difficulties that legitimately arose to require the employment of attorneys either to appear before a Department or before committees of Congress. I went upon the theory that the statement which was repeatedly made was true without reserve, namely, that here was a plain contractual obligation resting upon the Government, that from sheer negligence or indifference the Government refused or failed to pay, and that somebody was employed to stir up the different branches of the Government, so that those branches might do their duty. What I wanted to enforce was that services of that character are not legal services in any sense of the word.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, for a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator how he would differentiate that case from the one I will state? The Government granted certain lands to Indians somewhere about seventy-five years ago. The Indians had a fee simple to that land. They transferred it to one person. I think it was the Eli Ayres case; I am not certain. The Senator from Colorado will know.

Mr. PATTERSON. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. He purchased those lands. The Government then refused to issue its regular patent and resold the lands to others. For seventy-five years the owner of those lands, who had sought to get back his money that he had paid, was unable to get it. I do not know that he has got it yet.

Now, would the Senator think that in a case of that kind it was public policy for the heirs of that estate to pay an attorney for getting a bill through Congress and getting Congress to take hold of the matter?

Mr. PATTERSON. The two cases are very easily differentiated, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the ground of public policy, I mean.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; on the ground of public policy. The one I am supposing and that I presume exists is different from the one suggested by the Senator from North Dakota in many material particulars, but it is not at all necessary that time should be consumed in entering into a discussion of the differences.

What I wanted to enforce was the proposition that if the services to be rendered are simply to induce a department to do its plain duty, or a committee of Congress to do its plain duty, or the Senate and House to do its plain duty, those services are not professional in the sense of being legal services. They are services of a lobbyist, pure and simple. It depends upon the influence and the persistency of the individual who may assume to endeavor to set the different branches of the Government into motion. Services of that kind should not be recognized. They should be esteemed by every Senator and Member and the head of a Department as they are regarded by the courts of the country, as against public policy.

If that is the character of the claim that is provided for in the section of the conference report which is being discussed, then I have no hesitation whatever in saying that so far as my vote is concerned it will receive no countenance at all. If an attorney performs legitimate services, whether before a Department, or possibly before a committee of Congress if a committee was seeking enlightenment upon a question of law, then morally at least, an attorney deserves to be paid fair compensation in proportion to the quality of the services that he rendered and the time that was necessarily consumed; but for services that can only be characterized as the services of a lobbyist Congress ought not to contaminate itself, directly or indirectly, by even seeming to give credit to claims based upon such services.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator consider that an attorney engaged in ascertaining the title that Indians had to land, and spending years in getting the history of the tribe and everything bearing on the question of the Indian title to the lands is a lobbyist?

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not inject that into my proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that is a part of the services that are sought to be paid in this case.

Mr. PATTERSON. My proposition was—and I heard no serious contention of it until I raised the issue—that it was a clear cut, unequivocal contractual obligation by the Government with this Indian tribe to pay them a million and a half dollars; that there was no legal obstacle in the way; and that the services which were rendered were simply calculated to move the Department and to move Congress in a direction in which they should have moved voluntarily in the performance of a plain, simple, official duty.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the statutes of the United States, which some Senators certainly have overlooked. If Senators will turn to section 2103 of the Revised Statutes, they will find the following:

SEC. 2103. No agreement shall be made by any person with any tribe of Indians, or individual Indians not citizens of the United States, for the payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value, in present or in prospective, or for the granting or procuring any privilege to him, or any other person in consideration of services for said Indians relative to their lands, or to any claims growing out of, or in reference to, annuities, installments, or other moneys, claims, demands, or thing, under laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts of any officers thereof, or in any way connected with or due from the United States, unless such contract or agreement be executed and approved as follows.

Now, Mr. President, there is authority enough for anyone to make a contract under the conditions that existed in this case or almost any other that may be considered.

First. Such agreement shall be in writing, and a duplicate of it delivered to each party.

Second. It shall be executed before a judge of a court of record, and bear the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs indorsed upon it.

Third. It shall contain the names of all parties in interest, their residence and occupation; and if made with a tribe, by their tribal authorities, the scope of authority and the reason for exercising that authority, shall be given specifically.

Fourth. It shall state the time when and place where made, the particular purpose for which made, the special thing or things to be done under it, and, if for the collection of money, the basis of the claim, the source from which it is to be collected, the disposition to be made of it when collected, the amount or rate per cent of the fee in all cases; and if any contingent matter or condition constitutes a part of the contract or agreement, it shall be specifically set forth.

Fifth. It shall have a fixed limited time to run, which shall be distinctly stated.

That is about all of that. A reference to the particular contract in this case will be found by looking at a letter in the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs which accompanied this bill. On page 138 of that report I find the following:

On May 12, 1894, the Indians of the Colville Reservation entered into a contract with Messrs. Levi Maish and Hugh H. Gordon, attorneys, stipulating for their employment to prosecute the claim of these Indians against the United States for payment of their interest claimed by them in the lands of their reservation that were restored to the public domain by the act of July 1, 1892, supra—

That act I have here if any one desires to look at it—and which were opened to settlement by proclamation of the President.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask my colleague if the act restoring the land to the public domain describes the land that was contracted for by the Government with this tribe of Indians?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can look at it right there. It is rather difficult to state what it does provide. It is the act of July 1, 1892, and will be found on page 62, volume 27, United States Statutes at Large.

The letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs from which I have been reading continues:

Said contract was approved by this office on July 17, 1894—

The Department must have believed that there was a necessity for these lawyers, that there was something for them to do—limiting the fees to be paid the attorneys to 10 per cent of the recoveries, and was similarly approved by the Department on July 25, 1894.

That is, by both the Commissioner and the Secretary of the Interior.

This contract expired by limitation on May 12, 1904.

The Department, on April 2, 1904, referred to this Office, for report, a bill (S. 5293) for the relief of the Colville Indians. This bill provided, among other things, that the Secretary of the Treasury should state an account of the Colville Indians against the United States, in which credit was to be given the Indians for the amount provided under the agreement of May 9, 1891, and were to be charged with the amount allowed them under the terms of the act approved July 1, 1902. (27 Stat. L., 62.)

In the report of the bill, dated April 14, 1904 (Finance), the Office again reviewed the entire case, and recommended the passage of the bill. With that report was a copy of Office letter dated March 25, 1899 (see committee hearings on Indian appropriation bill, 58th Cong., 3d sess., p. 133), in which the Office reviewed at some length the matter of the title of the Colville Indians to the reservation set apart for them by the Executive order of July 2, 1872, and stated that it had not the slightest doubt as to the possessory rights of said Indians to the lands within the reservation, "rights which the courts have always recognized without qualification, and which it was the uniform practice of the legislative and executive branches of our Government to observe and respect during nearly a century of its history."

Mr. President, without going into any elaborate discussion of this matter, which I do not propose to do, in 1872 the President set aside, by an Executive order, an extensive reservation containing at least three or four million acres of land. In that order he included a settlement of several hundred white people. There was great complaint up there, of course, about it, and then it was modified. Another Executive order was issued, changing the boundaries so as to leave out those white people.

Now, that has been the question. The question was, Did these Indians own that land when the Executive order was made out, or was it an attempt on the part of the President of the United States to give them a tract of land which did not belong to them? It was asserted by those who did not want the Indians there that it never had belonged to them, that they had never owned the land, and, Mr. President, there was some force in that declaration, undoubtedly. But it was a recognition by the President that they did own that land, because they were there in possession of it and had been in possession of it since anyone knew anything about that section of country.

There was a report made May 12, 1892, by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, Mr. Manderson, then a Senator from Nebraska, making the report, in which the question came up as to their rights to the ground. It is an extensive report, and I will not attempt to read it. They did not in that bill recognize the right of the Indians to that land. We proceeded in spite of that to open the land, and in spite of the fact that we had already an inchoate treaty with these Indians, or an arrangement which was not then consummated, and I do not believe it has ever been consummated since, although there may have been some recognition of their right, because in the bill of the House I have just handed my colleague it was provided, as I recollect, that the Indians might take allotments inside of this land opened to the public at large.

Mr. President, this matter has been here a long time. It has had all the time, I think, the approval of the Department of the Interior that the money ought to be paid. I myself was not very friendly to the payment of the money originally. I thought it was rather an unfair proposition in the first place to include these white people; and then, again, I thought it was rather unfair to give to the Indians the benefit of all the lands there were in that section of the country. But the Department has steadily and repeatedly declared that, in their opinion, they were entitled to it; and in this letter sent to the Senate February 11 the Department again declared that the Indians are entitled to this money—money, Mr. President, which they did not get, money which they have not got to the present hour, and judging from the disposition of some Senators, at least, money they are not likely to get for some time to come.

It may be that it is a very improper thing to allow men to come here and present the claims of the Indians against the Government, but it has been done ever since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. They have no other place to make application.

Mr. TELLER. As the Senator from Alabama well says, they have no other place to make the application. They can not sue the United States. The history of our dealing with the Indians is full of cases where the Government of the United States has finally acknowledged its liability by the persistent efforts, not of lobbyists, but of men who brought before the committees evidence that the Government was under moral and legal obligation to render to the Indians what they claimed. Not long ago the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a judgment for nearly $4,000,000 that we had been refusing to pay for many years.

Mr. President, you can not get a case against the United States until you come here and first get a committee to look it over or get permission to go into a court and bring a suit. That is what has been done repeatedly; and that is what every man connected with the Indian affairs of this country knows has been an absolute necessity. Recognizing that, the statutes of the United States have provided carefully and prudently and properly under what terms attorneys should be allowed to present the claims of the Indians here. There is no decision of the United States Supreme Court or of any other court that will deny that he who has brought himself within the provision of that statute is not entitled to as much credit as anybody else who prosecutes a claim against an offending debtor.

Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago that away back years ago I questioned the right of the President of the United States to recognize that these people were the owners of that land to the extent that he did. But he did it by sending men there who made a contract with them, not one that binds us, but we never repudiated it except when we took the lands which they were occupying, which they were claiming, without paying for it, but recognizing by the very act that they were entitled to something, because we gave them permission to segregate a portion of that land and take it as their own, and we did not give to any white man who went upon that land the same terms.

Mr. President, our official bodies and officers charged with the duty of looking after the interests of these Indians have recognized such claims. They have recognized the right of the Indians to have their attorneys come before the Senate committees to plead their cause. The Senate has in innumerable instances provided for the payment of attorneys without going to the court when there was no question about the sum to be paid, and when there was a difficulty of that kind we have sent them to the court.

Within the last two years we paid attorneys in the Indian Territory $750,000 upon a contract approved by the Department of the Interior, as the law required, which gave them a million and a half dollars. They had secured from this Government the payment to the Indians of—well, I will not say from the Government—but they had settled a controversy in favor of the claimants that was worth to them at least $3,000,000, because it was a question of the ownership of land. They had brought to their clients a great fortune—not to a few men only, but to a large number of clients.

Mr. SPOONER. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a pretty large percentage of $3,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have myself never had any relation with the prosecution of any claim of this kind, but I have been where I have seen it. I am told by one of these men—and he is a reputable man—that he had broken himself up and was bankrupt because of his efforts to get that controversy righted long before he got a dollar out of it.

The attorneys prosecuting such claims put up the money; they come here and they hang around. Sometimes, I will admit, they become offensive and objectionable; and yet, after all, when they get through, when they have got permission to go to court, as they have again and again, and when the court, the place of last resort to settle these questions, has determined that the Government has been wrongfully withholding from the Indian money which belongs to him, nobody can complain of their persistency. The attorneys ought to be paid such a sum as, in the judgment of Congress, they are entitled to, or such a sum as the court shall determine they are entitled to for the services rendered. This is the first time, Mr. President, in the Senate or anywhere else, that I have heard that such conduct on the part of attorneys was forbidden, either by the unwritten moral law or any other law. It is authorized by statute and authorized by at least fifty years of practice.

Mr. President, I ask to be allowed to add to what I have said a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated February 11, 1905.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 11, 1905.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by Department reference, for report, of a communication dated February 4, 1905, from Hon. W. M. Stewart, chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, inclosing copy of amendment to be proposed by Mr. Foster, of Washington, to the bill (H. R. 17474) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, etc., for the fiscal year 1906.

The amendment is intended to carry into effect the agreement, dated May 9, 1891, between the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation and the commissioners appointed by the President, under authority of the act of Congress approved August 19, 1890, to negotiate with said Indians for the cession of a portion of their reservation. The amendment provides that there shall be set aside and held in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of said Indians, which shall at all times be subject to the appropriation of Congress, the sum of $1,500,000, in full payment for 1,500,000 acres of land ceded by said agreement.

In order to furnish the information called for it will be necessary to refer to some of the history relative to the establishment of this reservation. The Executive order of April 9, 1872, set apart for the use and occupancy of the Colville and other Indians residing in that vicinity the tract of country in the then Territory of Washington lying between the Columbia River as the western boundary and the Pend Oreille (or Clarks Fork) and one hundred and seventeenth meridian (Idaho Territory line) as the eastern boundary, and between the Spokane River as the southern and the British possessions as the northern boundary.

Soon after the issuance of said order it was alleged, by correspondence received in this Office, that the lands covered thereby embraced almost the entire white population of Stephens County, numbering about 600 people, two villages, 100 farms, several saw and flour mills, a court-house, jail, etc., and it was desirable that the Executive order should be revoked. Upon the recommendation of the Department, the President, by Executive order of July 2, 1872, revoked said order of April 9, 1872, and directed that in lieu thereof a country bounded by the Columbia River on the east and south, by the Okanogan River on the west, and by the British possessions on the north be set apart as a reservation for said Indians. This was the boundary of the reservation at the time that the agreement was entered into with said Indians to cede a portion of their reservation to the United States.

The Indian appropriation act approved August 19, 1890 (26 Stat. L., 355), authorized the President to appoint a commission to negotiate with said Indians for such portion of their reservation "as said Indians may be willing to dispose of, that the same may be opened to white settlers." A commission was appointed by the President, and on May 9, 1891, they entered into an agreement with the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation for the cession by said Indians of an area of country comprising 1,500,000 acres of land, at a consideration of $1,500,000 in money payable in five equal annual installments, to be distributed per capita among the Indians entitled to receive it, and other benefits of value, the deferred payments to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

This agreement was, by letter of January 6, 1892, with a draft of a bill prepared by this Office, transmitted by the President to Congress for its action. The correspondence relative to this matter up to the submission of the agreement to Congress is printed in Executive Document No. 15, Fifty-second Congress, first session.

The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs refused to recommend the ratification of the agreement, taking the ground that the Indians had no title to the reservation set apart for them by the Executive order of July 2, 1872, which the Government was bound to recognize and which would, in effect, be recognized by the ratification of the agreement. (See Senate Report No. 664, 52d Cong., 1st sess.)

In lieu of ratifying the agreement a bill was reported by the Senate committee vacating the north one-half of the reservation (the part proposed to be ceded by the agreement), which bill became a law July 1, 1892, without the President's approval. (27 Stat. L., 62.)

That act provides for the disposal of the vacated land under the homestead laws at $1.50 per acre, in addition to the fee provided by law, and that the net proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands to be opened to settlement and entry shall be set apart in the Treasury of the United States for the time being, but subject to such future appropriation for public use as Congress may make, and that until so otherwise appropriated may be subject to the expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior, from time to time, in such amount as he shall deem best in the building of schoolhouses, maintenance of schools for such Indians, and in such other manner as he may deem proper for the promotion of education, civilization, and self-support among said Indians.

The act also provides for the making of allotments in severalty to the Indians located on the lands restored to the public domain, the title of such allotments to be held in trust by the United States for the period of twenty-five years.

By the act of February 20, 1896 (29 Stats., 9), Congress extended the mineral-land laws of the United States to the lands embraced in the north one-half of the Colville Reservation.

On February 7, 1903, the President approved "An act providing for free homesteads on the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers in the north one-half of the Colville Indian Reservation, State of Wash-lington, and reserving the public lands for that purpose." (32 Stats., 803.)

In February, 1903, the Department referred to this Office, for report, a communication, dated February 16, 1903, from Hon. William M. Stewart, chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, inclosing a copy of bill (S. 7264) "conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Colville Indians in the State of Washington," with request for a report thereon for the information of the committee.

On February 25, 1903, this Office submitted to the Department a report setting forth at considerable length a history of the case, and in support of the bill the Office said it would seem that the Indians of the Colville Reservation are asking, not without reason, that their claim for compensation of lands excluded from their reservation be referred to the Court of Claims for determination, and so far as this Office was concerned it had no objection to offer to the enactment of the bill (S. 7264) having that end in view. It expressed the opinion, however, that the Indians would have difficulty in recovering compensation through the action of the courts, in view of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Lone Wolf et al. v. Hitchcock (reported in Senate Ex. Doc. No. 147, 57th Cong., 2d sess.; also Compilation of Laws and Treaties Relating to Indian Affairs, 2d ed., Kappler, Vol. I, p. 1058), in which it was held in effect that Congress, in the exercise of its administrative authority over tribal Indian property, possesses full power in the premises which the judiciary may not question or inquire into.

The bill provided that the Indians might bring suit in the Court of Claims by an attorney or attorneys authorized to represent them, whose compensation should be fixed by the court; also that the Attorney-General should appear and defend such suit. The Office strongly recommended that in order to afford the Indians full protection in the employment of counsel the bill be so amended as to provide for the employment and compensation of counsel by the Indians under section 2103 of the Revised Statutes, instead of allowing the Court of Claims to fix the compensation of the attorneys. The bill in question, however, did not pass.

On May 12, 1894, the Indians of the Colville Reservation entered into a contract with Messrs. Levi Maish and Hugh H. Gordon, attorneys, stipulating for their employment to prosecute the claim of these Indians against the United States, for payment of their interest claimed by them in the lands of their reservation that were restored to the public domain by the act of July 1, 1892, supra, and which were opened to settlement by proclamation of the President. Said contract was approved by this Office on July 17, 1894, limiting the fees to be paid the attorneys to 10 per cent of the recoveries, and was similarly approved by the Department on July 25, 1894. This contract expired by limitation on May 12, 1904.

The Department, on April 2, 1904, referred to this Office, for report, a bill (S. 5293) for the relief of the Colville Indians. This bill provided, among other things, that the Secretary of the Treasury should state an account of the Colville Indians against the United States, in which credit was to be given the Indians for the amount provided under the agreement of May 9, 1891, and were to be charged with the amount allowed them under the terms of the act approved July 1, 1902. (27 Stat. L., 62.)

In the report of the bill, dated April 14, 1904 (Finance), the Office again reviewed the entire case and recommended the passage of the bill. With that report was a copy of Office letter dated March 25, 1899 (see committee hearings on Indian appropriation bill, 58th Cong., 3d sess., p. 133), in which the Office reviewed at some length the matter of the title of the Colville Indians to the reservation set apart for them by the Executive order of July 2, 1872, and stated that it had not the slightest doubt as to the possessory rights of said Indians to the lands within the reservation, "rights which the courts have always recognized without qualification, and which it was the uniform practice of the legislative and executive branches of our Government to observe and respect during nearly a century of its history."

The letter of March 25, 1899, is too lengthy to be copied at this time, but if the copy heretofore furnished can be procured, the Office would desire very much that it be considered in connection with this report.

In all of the reports made by this Office in regard to the rights of the Indians to that part of the reservation ceded to the United States in the agreement dated May 9, 1901, it has expressed the opinion that the Indians had a good and valid title to the land in question, and that they ought to be paid the amount stated in the agreement made with them by the commission appointed for that purpose. Therefore that part of the amendment which provides for carrying into effect the agreement of May 9, 1891, meets with the hearty approval of this Office.

Very respectfully,

F. E. LEUPP, Commissioner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" have it; and the report is agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, there are two or three other matters in the report that will have to be explained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator rise to the conference report?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir; I rise to speak in reference to the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will, then, consider the report as before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the provision under discussion may not be subject to a point of order as being entirely new matter, though neither House considered it; but it is tacked onto and made part of an amendment which relates to the Colville Reservation. Possibly it would not be technically subject to the point of order, though it is really extraneous and entirely new and relates to a subject with which neither the Senate nor the House has dealt.

The question of morality, honesty, and decency, I suppose, can not be well brought in here; but it does really look to be extraordinary that a treaty made with these Indians for the purchase of their land, and signed by the commissioners representing the Government and by the Indian chiefs, and ratified by Congress, the debt being recognized as a perfectly valid obligation of the Government—I say it does seem extraordinary that, after such a proceeding, it then becomes necessary for lawyers to step in and get some kind of an agreement, which has never been produced—we are told it exists, and I suppose it must exist—but some kind of a contract is entered into by attorneys to collect this claim from the Government. The claim goes on until it runs out of date, Congress neglecting its duty to pay its just obligations, and then, finally, here, in the closing days of this session, without the Indian Committee having considered it this year, this provision is brought in recognizing a claim of lawyers, and reference is made to the Court of Claims to determine the character and justice and legality, I presume, of the claim of these attorneys.

What I complain of, Mr. President, is that the committee did not put this provision in regard to the claim of these attorneys into the bill, but that it must go in through the back window, so to speak, of the conference committee. Leaving out all considerations of the legitimacy and propriety of the action, it does look to me to be extraordinary and a disgrace to this Government that such a proceeding is necessary or is permissible.

I do not know how we are going to stop it, unless the Senate should at some time take steps to take cognizance of what is being done here and take up such provisions as this and kick them out. I myself should like to get an opportunity to vote against any such scheme of spoliation as this. I do not want to call it "a steal," but it has every appearance of one; and while the Court of Claims may report that it is not a valid obligation of the Indians, still it is a system, a method of dealing with this question that ought not to be permited.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is another provision of the conference report to which I ask the attention of the conferees of the Senate. Amendment numbered 56, on page 6 of their report, amends the act for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. Section 2 of that act, or the portion of it to which I wish to direct attention, is as follows:

SEC. 2. That for ninety days after approval hereof applications shall be received for enrollment of children who were minors living March 4, 1906, whose parents have been enrolled as members of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, or Creek tribes, or have applications for enrollment pending at the approval hereof.

Omitting the balance of the section down to the second provision of that section, I read as follows:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to hereafter permit any person to file an application for enrollment in any tribe where the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

When the Indian appropriation bill was pending in committee an amendment was inserted striking out of this section of the act for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes what I have just read. The reason assigned at the time for adopting this amendment was that the minors or infants who were provided for in the beginning of the section would probably be considered as "persons," and it was deemed advisable to amend the act by striking out the provision leaving the law as it stood with all of the limitations therein, which afforded ample protection to the tribes and to the people.

The conference report, amendment No. 56, strikes out that provision and introduces another that reverses the action of the committee which reported the bill and of the Senate in passing it.

Mr. PATTERSON. To what amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Amendment numbered 56, on page 6 of the conference report. The new matter proposed to be substituted for the proviso which was embraced in the appropriation bill is this:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as hereafter to permit any person to file an application for enrollment, entitled to enrollment, in any of said tribes, except for minors, the children of Indians by blood, or of freedmen members of said tribes, or of Mississippi Choctaws identified under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, as herein otherwise provided.

And I call especial attention to the concluding lines, which are as follows:

And the fact that the name of a person appears on the tribal roll of any of said tribes shall not be construed to be an application for enrollment.

Now, note the distinction. The act of April 26, 1906, known as the "Five Civilized Tribes act," which this proposes to amend, or the proviso sought to be eliminated from it, dealt wholly with applications for enrollment. This amendment reads:

That nothing herein shall be construed so as hereafter to permit any person to file an application for enrollment or to be entitled to enrollment in any of said tribes.

The insertion of the words "or to be entitled to enrollment" contemplates a legislative judgment to take effect at the date of the passage of the act now before us.

This amendment of the conference report, if adopted, will work a great injustice to a large number of Indians. There are now pending before the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, for adjudication, a final determination of the rights of at least 2,000 persons. These are in every instance the application of parties in relation to whose cases special investigation was required prior to a final determination. When the applications were taken by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, if any question was raised as to their right to be enrolled, whether of fact or law, the Commissioner listed them upon what is called a "doubtful card," using a card index for that purpose. This was done in some cases where there appeared scarcely a doubt as to the right of the party making the application, but where the nation, through its representative, questioned the right of the claimant, desiring to look the matter up and determine in the future, or desiring to produce further testimony, or being in doubt as to the application of the law. The names of the people whose rights were thus questioned were placed upon doubtful cards, without the formality of sworn complaint, alleging either fraud, mistake of law, or mistake of fact.

This doubtful card list is naturally the only list to be handled by the Commissioner. These cases, if taken up for consideration, would be disposed of, under the legislation heretofore enacted, before March 4 next. This amendment, however, provides that no person shall be entitled to enrollment after the date of the passage of this act. These cases are still pending, awaiting investigation. They had no hearing at the times the rolls were being made. They have had none since. The adoption of this amendment will exclude them from any opportunity to show that they are entitled to enrollment. It makes no difference that they are of Indian blood, that they have been recognized as members of the tribes, that they have always resided with them, that their tribal rights have never been questioned. If this amendment is adopted their cases will never be heard and their rights never determined.

There is another class of cases that will be foreclosed from any hearing if this conference report is adopted. Under the act of 1896 the rolls established by the different tribes were recognized, and Indians whose names were entered upon those rolls by the tribal courts or tribal commissions that were recognized by the act were entitled to participate in the tribal funds and tribal property, unless some question was raised with respect to the regularity of their enrollment. There are about 150 cases of Indians entered upon the rolls by the tribal authorities, with respect to whose enrollment, however, within three months some question was raised by some Indian or some attorney for some Indian tribe. Those cases are still pending. The Interior Department has recognized the validity of those rolls so made up. The opinion of the assistant attorney-general of the Interior Department has been recently rendered, and holds that entry upon tribal roll was an application under the law within the three months' period and that the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes should so consider it, but that he was authorized to investigate each case upon its merits and under existing law to strike from the rolls any names which were placed there by fraud or without authority. The Secretary of the Interior approved this opinion. This conference amendment will deny the right to these people which the Interior Department says they are entitled to have tried out and determined.

Furthermore, there are a number of cases pending in the United States Supreme Court which were taken care of in the second proviso at the end of section 2 in the act for the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, the language there being as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation, whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

There are several of those cases. It is proposed now by this conference report to cut out those people. Amendment No. 56 repeals that provision of section 2 of the act for the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator is laboring under a mistake as to the effect of these provisions. The first prohibition in the act known as the "Five Civilized Tribes act" provided that no one should be enrolled as a citizen unless he had made application. The intermarried citizens have made application. In section 2 we expressly provide that the rolls should not be closed finally until March 4, 1907, on account of that case pending in the Supreme Court. The case has been argued and submitted. We had—and have now—every reason to suppose it would be determined. The right would not go back as to applications. If they had made their applications—and if they had not, of course they could not come in—they would have a right by any act that we passed between the 1st day of December and the 4th day of March to extend the time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, in connection with what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has stated, I should like to ask whether the proviso that is now adopted by the conference report forecloses the right of these people to be heard between now and March 4 next?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not see how it can foreclose anybody. Of course, under this provision we simply enact that tribal rolls shall not in themselves constitute evidence that application was made to the Commission for enrollment. That is the provision that is put in the conference report. Section 2 provides—that portion of it which is unaffected:

That for ninety days after approval hereof applications shall be received for enrollment of children.

And then it provides in section 1:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may enroll persons whose names appear upon any of the tribal rolls and for whom the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905, and which was not allowed solely because not made within the time prescribed by law.

Now, section 2, even if it had not been changed, would not have affected those rights at all, but in recasting section 2, which we could not do in conference because of the complications, and in making the prohibition correspond to the first two lines of section 2, which provides for the enrollment of children, we simply provide:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as hereafter to permit any person to file an application for enrollment or to be entitled to enrollment in any of said tribes——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is exactly the point. The proviso in section 1 of the act for the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes is as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may enroll persons whose names appear upon any of the tribal rolls and for whom the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905.

Now, where Indians appeared before the Indian authority recognized by the act of 1896 and had their names entered upon the tribal rolls, they went away satisfied that their cases were provided for, and, of course, made no application within the three months' period to the Dawes Commission, because the act of 1896 recognized enrollment upon the tribal rolls. Now, this amendment proposes——

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, the bill already passed, in April, I think it was, limited it to the tribal rolls practically in charge of the commissioner. It says:

Upon any of the tribal rolls and for whom the records in charge of the commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Nothing in this amendment one way or the other can touch that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but unless there was a distinct application to the Commission and some record of it preserved independently of the entry of the names upon the tribal rolls, section 1 of the Five Civilized Tribes act does not authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enroll persons applying. If it is not the purpose of this amendment to exclude these Indians, what is the significance of the words:

Or to be entitled to enrollment in any of said tribes.

Furthermore, if it is not the purpose to exclude those who were entered on the Indian rolls by the Indian authority recognized under the act of 1896 and whose entry there was understood by them, and I think fairly contemplated by the act, to establish their tribal rights, why is this provision incorporated in the conference report:

And the fact that the name of a person appears on the tribal roll of any said tribes shall not be construed to be an application for enrollment.

If any Indian, pursuant to the act of 1896, secured the entry of his name upon the tribal roll, but did not, in addition, file a formal application with the Dawes Commission, he would be excluded, because the Secretary of the Interior is only authorized by section 1 of the Five Civilized Tribes act to enroll those whose names appear on a tribal roll "and for whom the records in the charge of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905."

Mr. CLAPP. What rolls do you refer to? Do you refer to the rolls in charge of the Commissioner, and inferentially in the Department? They are retained as proof, as records in the hands of the Commission. But the rolls that have been taken out among the tribes, as to which nobody knows what may have been done, are prohibited from being evidence in themselves.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I refer to the rolls that were recognized by the act of 1896, and I say there are 150 Indians, at least, who were enrolled under that act, but as to whose rights some question was made at the time, so that they were not certified by the Dawes Commission; I say that their cases are still pending; that they made no other application, and that there is no record with the Commission, which is required in addition to the tribal roll, to entitle the Secretary of the Interior to enroll an applicant.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator must be mistaken. They are applications; they are records in the office of the Department.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the amendment of the conferees provides:

The fact that the name of a person appears on the tribal roll of any of said tribes shall not be construed to be an application for enrollment.

What is the purpose of that if it is not to shut them out?

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will permit me, I will answer once more. In the first place, any application that is pending is reserved under these two laws, with the conference amendment as we have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, if it is an application inpedendent of the mere entry of the Indian's name upon the roll.

Mr. CLAPP. Not necessarily. If that roll is now in the office, if that roll is in the charge, in the custody, of the Commissioner or the Department here, it is construed as an application, and the Secretary is recognizing it, and he has until the 4th of next March to complete it. If it consists of a card left with the Commission, it is an application. But these rolls that are not there, which may never have been there, rolls over which there is no control by the Government, which may have been tampered with ad libitum, this provides, wisely, and as it justly should, shall not, of themselves, constitute evidence of application. It seems to me the plainest proposition in the world.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is nothing in the amendment of the conferees with reference to those rolls which makes the distinction the Senator draws. It is a broad, sweeping provision.

Mr. CLAPP. I will state it once more.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do not state your construction of the law, just read the provision of the law, and allow Senators to make their own construction of it.

Mr. CLAPP. It reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior may enroll persons whose names appear upon any of the tribal rolls and for whom the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes—

It is not even limited to the official records—any records—show application was made prior to December 1, 1905, and which was not allowed solely because not made within the time prescribed by law: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as hereafter to permit any person to file an application for enrollment or to be entitled to enrollment in any of said tribes, except for minors, the children of Indians by blood, or of freedmen members of said tribes, or of Mississippi Choctaws identified under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, as herein otherwise provided, and the fact that the name of a person appears on the tribal roll of any of said tribes shall not be construed to be an application for enrollment.

That has to be read into the law which we passed in April. I insist that if the conference report becomes a part of the law, it simply will prevent rolls which have passed out of the control of the Department, being received as evidence not only of enrollment, but of application for enrollment.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask is this an amendment to the act in regard to the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir. Because in the Five Civilized Tribes act——

Mr. LODGE. That is the act we passed this winter?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. The whole act will have to be construed as one instrument.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Now, further, the reason why we had to pass that is this: When we got into conference we provided in section 2:

That for ninety days after approval hereof, applications shall be received for enrollment of children.

Then we went on down here:

That nothing herein shall be construed so as to hereafter permit any person to file an application.

There was nothing we could take into conference, and, as I stated when the amendment was before the Senate during the pendency of the Indian appropriation bill, it was put in so as to have the matter a subject of conference. I certainly would not knowingly deprive anyone down there of his rights. That is why we left it until next March to complete these rolls.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if there is anything in this bill to affect the status of what are known as "children of intermarried whites?"

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think there is. I certainly do not recall it.

Mr. BAILEY. I have had my attention called to a general statement that amendment No. 56 was intended to deprive children of intermarried whites of their rights, but I can not read that amendment to mean that. Of course I take the Senator's assurance.

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly can not be mistaken, so far as that is concerned. We had no such thought in mind.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is another provision here which I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain.

Senate amendment No. 50, at the bottom of page 42, provides as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall have prepared and printed in a permanent record book the tribal rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes and that one copy of such record book shall be deposited in the office of the recorder in each of the recording districts for public inspection free of charge.

The Senator will recall that when this bill was in the Senate, I suggested this very amendment to him, and I prepared an amendment of this character. But he, after communicating with the Department, declared they were very much opposed to it. It seemed to me a very wise and reasonable and just provision that the names of the landowners as recognized by the Government, not the persons who have been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin as entitled to enrollment, but those who were actually recognized as participating in the allotment of lands, should be accessible at each county seat, or other place of record, so that any person desiring to buy from an Indian could find out whether he was buying from an Indian recognized as such or was buying from an imposter or from some one whose claim to land had been disallowed.

This amendment went on the bill in the Senate, and it comes back in the conference report with this proviso. I want Senators to listen, for a more drastic and extraordinary provision I have never heard of:

That any person who shall copy any roll of citizenship of the Creek, Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, or Seminole tribes of Indians, prepared by or under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, or the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, whether completed or not, or any person who shall, directly or indirectly, exhibit, sell, offer to sell, give away, offer to give away, or in any manner or by any means offer to dispose of, or who shall have in his possession, any such roll or rolls, any copy of the same, or a copy of any portion thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by imprisonment for not exceeding two years: Provided, That this act shall not apply to any persons authorized by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes to copy, exhibit, or use such rolls, or a copy thereof, for any purpose necessary or required by law.

It appears to me that the Senate amendment, which provided for the deposit in an accessible place for the benefit of the public of these tribal rolls, is not only destroyed, but that this penal statute, which is so sweeping and drastic in its provisions, has no justification whatsoever. The only interpretation I can put upon it is that those who are interested in being go-betweens between the Indian owners of land and the white persons who may want to buy lands are determined to keep up the system of fees, or blackmail, or whatever else you may term it, for what ought to be information accessible to anyone. I should like to have an explanation why this provision was put in here.

Mr. CLAPP. That is very easy indeed, Mr. President, and I do it with a good deal of pleasure.

Pending the passage of this bill there was a great deal of trouble in the Indian Territory; parties were arrested, I think indicted, although I would not say how far the proceeding went, for surreptitiously getting the rolls. They were liable to make—although I do not say they got that far with it—what would seem to be copies of the rolls, with no responsibility attaching to the person who did it, and use those false rolls, improper rolls, for the purpose of dealing in land down there. A bill was pending in the Senate—I think it had passed the House—making it a misdemeanor to use the rolls, and the Senate amendment on this subject was as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall have prepared and printed in a permanent record book the tribal rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes, and that one copy of such record book shall be deposited in the office of the recorder in each of the recording districts for public inspection free of charge.

That also was very liable to lead to trouble until those rolls are absolutely completed, and so the conferees inserted the words "upon completion of the approved rolls."

Experience has abundantly proved down there that access to these rolls before they are completed, while they are the subject of review, perhaps the subject of examination in the Department on appeal, and still subject to review, may lead and does lead to a great deal of trouble and difficulty. Until the rolls are completed no person should be placed where he or she may rely upon their correctness, because it is liable to mislead them and lead them into trouble. When these rolls are completed, there should be one place where they can be found and examined, their authenticity absolute and unquestioned, and that is in the recording offices of the Territory. So we provided that after the rolls were completed, one copy of each book should be deposited in the office of the recorder in each of the recording districts for public inspection.

I wish to say in this connection that this was at the urgent solicitation of the Department of the Interior. I never knew a man who worked as hard and incessantly, actuated by such an absolute sense of duty to his trust, as this man does. I never knew a man who worked surrounded by greater difficulties than he does, and with more difficult problems to solve, and while we may not always agree with him—there are very often times when I do not myself—at the same time when it comes to administering the affairs of that Territory, which is particularly and peculiarly within his jurisdiction, I feel that his judgment is entitled to a great deal of weight. I believe now that we have it adjusted so that when the roll is safe, and it is never safe for inspection until it is finished, it will become open to public inspection, and copies of it will be put in the various recording offices. At the same time we make it a misdemeanor for people to peddle around unauthorized, unauthenticated, and untrue rolls, upon which they may speculate in real estate and entangle people in the meshes of litigation.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The proviso to section 2 of act No. 129 is as follows:

That nothing herein shall be construed so as to hereafter permit any person to file an application for enrollment in any tribe where the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States.

Now, the conference committee has inserted these words:

Or to be entitled to enrollment in.

Where applications have been filed and not acted on, does not this language, "or to be entitled to enrollment in," preclude action upon the application?

Mr. CLAPP. That does not seem possible.

Mr. SPOONER. Why were those words put in?

Mr. CLAPP. That clause is used in connection with the applications, perhaps not necessarily. We have made ample provision for applications for enrollment and for completing the rolls. As the law for the Five Civilized Tribes passed the Senate, whatever is done here is an enlargement of the right and not a restriction. It is enlarged as to minors. That is the sum total of the effect of the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. There is an exception in this act as to minors.

Mr. CLAPP. I know; but that is at the beginning of section 2.

Mr. SPOONER. What I want to get from the Senator is the effect. What effect is it intended by the conference committee that shall be given to these words after the word "enrollment," "or to be entitled to enrollment in any of said tribes?" We have already covered applications. Are these new words necessary; and what is the legal effect of them unless they mean that even if the application had been made they shall not be entitled to be enrolled under the application?

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator refers to the proviso:

That nothing herein shall be construed so as hereafter to permit any person to file an application for enrollment or to be entitled to enrollment in any of said tribes.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I refer to.

Mr. CLAPP. They can not qualify the law, which expressly provides for no enrollment where applications were not made prior to the 1st day of December, 1905.

Mr. SPOONER. What purpose was intended by the insertion of the words?

Mr. CLAPP. I presume it is just as in a number of other cases where at this session we have inserted the words "fair and reasonable." One could not possibly qualify the other. If a thing is fair, it is reasonable; and if it is reasonable, it is fair. Two words in that unnecessary manner are constantly occurring in legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. The court will not hold it to be unnecessary. The court will not hold these words to have been incorporated without a purpose. Now, what was that purpose? It is not dealing with applications. That is taken care of:

That nothing herein shall be construed so as hereafter to permit any person to file an application for enrollment or to be entitled to enrollment.

That is new.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that is right, unless they made application as provided in section 1 prior to the 1st day of December, 1905.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it say that?

Mr. CLAPP. The entire act says that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator permit me a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the Senator to say that unless they have filed their application with the Secretary of the Interior prior to December 1, 1905——

Mr. CLAPP. I think that is the date. The Senator will understand that all of this section 1 is an enlargement of time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just one matter.

Mr. CLAPP. It enlarges it several times.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I direct the Senator's attention to one point?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir; I am listening.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under what conditions may the Secretary receive an application for enrollment?

Mr. CLAPP. He can only receive an application if this amendment is adopted——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Without this amendment, under section 1 of the act for the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CLAPP. He could not receive any application unless the application was made prior to December 1, 1905.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And could he receive any application unless the name appeared upon the rolls and there was record evidence additional to the rolls with the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes that he had made application?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly, if his application was made prior to December 1, 1905, under the language here broadened, as it is, by "records," instead of saying "official record." Anything that was in his office as documentary would be evidence that he had made application.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But suppose there was nothing in the office of the Commissioner except the tribal rolls with the man's name on it, would he have a right to have his application considered to be enrolled?

Mr. CLAPP. Unquestionably. If he did not, I do not know how to frame a law to give him that right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will yield further, I submit to him, if he will just give attention for one moment to the reading of the proviso, it is perfectly plain that no application can be considered simply because the name of the applicant appears upon the roll.

Mr. CLAPP. I absolutely agree with that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And in addition to that there must be some record. Now listen to the language of the act No. 129:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may enroll persons whose names appear upon any of the tribal rolls and for whom the records in charge of the Commissioner of the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905, and which was not allowed solely because not made within the time prescribed by law.

As I stated before, there are about 150 who made no record in the office of the Commissioner, who simply had their names entered upon the rolls and rested with that.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator if that roll was in the office——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not care where the roll was. It does not make any difference. They are not entitled to enrollment. They are plainly, under the language of that proviso of section 1 of the Five Civilized Tribes act, not entitled to be enrolled unless their names shall appear upon the tribal roll and unless, in addition to that, they made a record with the Commissioner with the Five Civilized Tribes. The last lines of the conference report plainly aim to exclude and cut off those who have only the record of their names upon the tribal roll, notwithstanding the fact the Attorney-General has rendered an opinion, and the Secretary of the Interior has approved it, that the mere entry of those names upon the tribal roll gives them a rightful claim, upon which they ought to have their cases investigated without any additional record in the office of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to have the appearance of being obstinate, and I know Senators are very much interested in getting this bill out of the way. I had hoped that it was ended, having twice, as I thought, succeeded in preventing an infamous outrage from being perpetrated in this act and in the act for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes; and yet it sneaks back. Senators will recall the fact that when——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I call the Senator to order. I take exception to his language. He charges that this provision "sneaks back." I submit, Mr. President, that is not parliamentary language. It is not warranted by the facts of the case. The Senator's own experience in the conference on the rate bill ought to estop him from making charges of that kind, for he knows that the Senate conferees must either let amendments which the Senate puts on go out or bring back the bill, and that would involve the bringing back here of an appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if I have transgressed the rules of the Senate and spoken words that are amenable to the criticism which the Senator just made, of course I desire to withdraw them. I always try to say what I think and what I believe, and I can not help it. It is my misfortune rather than my fault. I am only speaking of the fact that when the bill for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes was under consideration I found in it this provision:

> The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed: Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

Senators will recall the fact that I had what I thought were the assurances of the chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee, who must know that I have no animosity or personal feeling toward him other than that of good will and friendship. I was assured that the Senator and the Senate conferees would endeavor to get those words out or would be willing to let them go out, as they were a Senate amendment. When the bill came back they were in, and the explanation given was that the House conferees insisted on having them stay in. Of course, being a Senate amendment, the Senate conferees could not insist on their own amendment going out. I recognize the difficulties under which they labored, and that when the House conferees agreed that they must stay in it left the Senate conferees more or less helpless.

Having in mind, however, the fact that the Indian appropriation bill, which we now have under consideration, was amended in several particulars to change the statute relating to the Five Civilized Tribes, which had not then been approved, I thought I could get this obnoxious provision eliminated. I therefore offered an amendment to the bill which is now under consideration, which will be found on the top of page 47, striking out of the bill for the Five Civilized Tribes the provision relating to Brown and Jenkins.

Again the Senate conferees accepted it. They assured me that they would endeavor to get the matter agreed to in conference and these words striken out of the bill in conference; but again it returns. So having tried twice to get this outrageous provision, as I call it, taken out of the law, first in the Five Civilized Tribes bill and then out of the Indian appropriation bill, when it comes back here again I thought I was justified a little while ago in using the language that somehow or other it sneaked back. It does not sneak, of course, except that unless one reads the conference report and then goes back to the original matter and examines into it he can not understand what is being done; and that is what I had in mind when I spoke of the sneaking process. In the first instance, the Senate conferees had to accept the House's mind, because the House did not object to the Senate amendment and accepted it, and the Senate conferees were helpless. But in this case the conditions are reversed, and we find that instead of the House conferees accepting our amendments and leaving our conferees helpless, our conferees surrendered to the House on this remarkable provision.

Now, why do I call it remarkable? I send to the desk, Mr. President, to have read, a couple of letters officially dealing with the subject, one from the Indian Commissioner, which I will send up first, in relation to this matter of A. J. Brown and Jenkins, dated away back in February.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated February 28, 1906.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he would not just as lief have the letters go in the RECORD without being read?

Mr. TILLMAN. That depends entirely upon whether the Senator in charge of the conference report will consent to have this matter go over until Monday, when we will have more time to explain and discuss this question. If so, I will put that letter in the RECORD without reading and also this other letter, so that Senators who wish to take any interest in the matter at all can examine them for themselves and see how infamous this transaction is.

Mr. CLAPP. With the consent of the Senate, I will put papers in the RECORD also; the papers which I send to the desk.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing to have all papers bearing on the subject put in the RECORD, for we want to see both sides of the question, because it appears to be an extraordinary proceeding that litigation instituted by the Indian Office and the Secretary of the Interior for the protection of orphans should be taken out of court. It is an extraordinary thing to go in by just simply having the act ratified, on the facts shown by the letters I have sent to the desk.

Mr. KEAN. I hope the Senators will consent to that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the papers submitted by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Minnesota will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters submitted by Mr. TILLMAN are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 28, 1906.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: * * * Attention is respectfully invited to the amendment beginning with line 9, page 11, and ending with line 18. This amendment has reference to the money disbursed by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non under the act of May 31, 1900, and proposes to ratify and confirm his action in disbursing the money. In connection therewith attention is invited to office report of February 6, 1905, Land 10810, reporting on an amendment intended to be proposed to House bill 5976, which is identical with the amendment as it appears here. The amendment is quoted in full in said report.

This subject has been investigated under the direction of the Department of Justice, and papers before this Office on April 13, 1904, showed that Andrew Jackson Brown collected from himself as administrator of Seminole estates for the Wewoka Trading Company, of which firm he was a partner, and for which he acted as agent, $72,783.84; that he paid Samuel J. Crawford, as attorney, $27,392.82; and that both payments were apparently made without authority of law. The question of the distribution by Mr. Brown is pending before the probate commissioner, under the supervision and jurisdiction of the United States court for the western judicial district of the Indian Territory. The Government has recently retained the former United States district attorney for the northern district of the Indian Territory, who is familiar with the subject, as special counsel in the case, and I believe that the question as to whether Mr. Brown properly disbursed the funds may safely be left to the court.

Furthermore, the Seminole agreement, approved by act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stats., 567), provides, among other things, that—

"The town site of Wewoka shall be controlled and disposed of according to the provisions of an act of the general council of the Seminole Nation, approved April 23, 1897, relative thereto, and on extinguishment of the tribal government deeds of conveyance shall issue to owners of lots as herein provided for allottees and all lots remaining unsold at that time may be sold in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

A. J. Brown, brother of the principal chief, was made secretary of the commission to dispose of the Wewoka town site. This commission selected a tract of 640 acres, within the boundaries of which were permanent improvements claimed by the said Secretary Brown, and 160 acres within the town-site limits were set aside for said Brown, as provided by section 3 of the Seminole act.

In February, 1900, John F. Brown, principal chief of the nation, submitted to the commission a proposition on behalf of himself and his brother A. J. Brown, to purchase the lots remaining unsold for the lump sum of $12,000. During about three years following the organization of the commission and prior to February, 1900, only seven lots were sold, and the proposal of John F. Brown was accepted and the transaction concluded by the execution of a deed dated February 12, 1900, to John F. Brown, purporting to convey all of the lots in the town site of Wewoka remaining unsold and not otherwise disposed of. The legality of these proceedings was questioned and the Seminole Nation made an investigation, and on December 16, 1903, passed an act declaring that the sale of the town site by the town-site commission "was done in accordance with the law governing the same."

There was still a question as to the validity of the sale of the town site of Wewoka, and Congress, by the act of March 3, 1903 (33 Stats., 1048, 1068), confirmed and ratified the action of the town-site commissioners in disposing of the unsold lots in the town to John F. Brown. The records of this office show that A. J. Brown was interested in the purchase and, in my opinion, Congress has been very lenient with the Browns; so I earnestly recommend that you request that the amendment herein mentioned be eliminated from the bill and that the question of determining whether the distribution was properly made by Mr. Brown be left to the courts.

Very respectfully,

F. E. LEUPP, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1906.

CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: There is inclosed herewith copy of a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. TELLER to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Said amendment provides:

"That the disbursements of the sum of $186,000 to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent, appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown, as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed."

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommends, for reasons stated by him, that said amendment should not be enacted into law.

I fully concur with the Commissioner in his recommendation.

Respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 6, 1906.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: The Office is in receipt of Department letter of February 2, 1906, transmitting, for immediate report and recommendation, an "Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. TELLER to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes."

The proposed amendment is as follows:

"And provided, That the disbursements of the sum of $186,000 to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent, appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed."

By the act of May 31, 1900 (31 Stats., 221, 240) the sum of $186,000 was appropriated "to pay the balance of awards made to loyal Seminole Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, with interest thereon, as per articles 3 and 4 of the treaty of March 21, 1866, and paragraph 14 of the agreement of December 16, 1897, under payments to be in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims under said articles and paragraph."

The appropriation was disbursed during April, May, and June, 1901, under departmental direction, by James E. Jenkins, who was then a special agent of this Office, and on April 13, 1904, the Office made report on a communication from Acting Attorney-General McReynolds, dated March 31, 1904, concerning the recommendations of Pliny L. Soper, esq., special assistant United States attorney, in the matter of the loyal Seminole claims made to the probate commissioner on exceptions of the lawful heirs of deceased loyal Seminoles to the report of Andrew Jackson Brown, administrator de bonis non of the estates of deceased loyal Seminoles, relating to the moneys handled by him appropriated by Congress for the payment of the loyal Seminole claims.

From the papers before the Office at that time it appeared that the judge of the United States court for the northern district of the Indian Territory during vacation issued an order of distribution of the money thus appropriated. This order was issued on the report of Z. T. Walrond, probate commissioner. Mr. Soper said that he was positive that the court was not in session at Wewoka at the time the order was issued, and that there was no record of an order of distribution having been made by the court; he considered the order absolutely null and void, as being in violation of chapter 149 of Mansfield's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, since it was issued by a judge and not by the court.

From said papers it did not seem that the order had been approved by the court when in session.

The cases are on the probate docket in the United States court for the western judicial district of the Indian Territory, and are numbered 22 to 284, both inclusive.

Andrew Jackson Brown was at the time of the distribution a member of the Wewoka Trading Company, and the papers before the Office on April 13, 1904, showed that, of the amount distributed by him as administrator de bonis non, $72,783.84 was paid to the Wewoka Trading Company; that Samuel J. Crawford, as attorney, was paid $27,392.82, and that the cost of administration was $3,007.04. The amount paid Mr. Crawford apparently included a charge of $1,003.42 against minors unpaid and a charge of $1,185.49 against adults unpaid, making a total of $2,188.91.

It appeared that the administrator, Andrew Jackson Brown, was to have been allowed 3 per cent of the amount of each estate for his services, and Mr. Soper said that he would therefore be entitled to the sum of $4,538.98; but the figures attached as an exhibit did not balance, and the papers showed that in many instances, where the amounts alleged to be due Samuel J. Crawford and the Wewoka Trading Company were the entire amount due individuals, no charge was made for the cost of administration.

It also appeared that Andrew Jackson Brown, as administrator, acted as agent for the Wewoka Trading Company, of which firm he was a partner, and that in his capacity as agent he collected for the Wewoka Trading Company from himself, as administrator of Seminole estates, the sum above mentioned, to wit, $72,783.84.

Special Agent Jenkins paid Andrew Jackson Brown, as administrator of the estates of deceased Seminoles, $151,299.60, of which amount he paid to the Wewoka Trading Company, Samuel J. Crawford, and for cost of administration $103,183.70, which is about 69 per cent of the amount paid him by the special agent.

The Office said that the payment to Mr. Crawford seemed to have been made without authority of law; that in most of the cases payments were made without the consent of the persons from whose estates the deductions were made, and that proper action should be taken to recover the amount so paid Mr. Crawford.

It also said that, in its opinion, Andrew Jackson Brown should be required to pay into court all of the money received by him, in order that it might be properly distributed, and that such payment should include the money paid Mr. Crawford, the amount Andrew Jackson Brown, as administrator, paid himself as agent for the Wewoka Company, and the amount collected by him for his services.

The question of the validity of the distribution by Mr. Brown of the amounts herein mentioned is pending before the probate commissioner under the jurisdiction and supervision of the United States court for the western judicial district of the Indian Territory, and the Government has recently retained the former United States district attorney for the northern district of the Indian Territory, who is entirely familiar with the cases, as special counsel therein. As I believe that the question whether Mr. Brown properly disbursed the funds may safely be left to the court, I respectfully recommend that the chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs be advised that, in the opinion of the Department, the intended amendment should not be enacted into law.

Very respectfully, F. E. LEUPP, Commissioner.

The papers submitted by Mr. CLAPP are as follows:

EBBITT HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1906.

Hon. M. E. CLAPP,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Referring to an item in the Indian appropriation bill repealing section 9 of the act approved April 26, 1906, I beg to say that if the honorable Senators who are supporting that item were correctly informed as to the facts, they would not for a moment favor its retention in the bill, but on the contrary they would earnestly oppose it. In 1866 the Government made a treaty with the Seminole Nation, wherein it agreed to pay the loyal Seminoles for property lost and destroyed during the civil war. For thirty-odd years the Government neglected and failed to fulfill that provision of the treaty. The said losses amounted to $163,000, less the amount previously paid.

By the treaty this sum was to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent until paid. During this long period of waiting the loyal Seminoles often petitioned and asked for payment, but as often they were refused, until 1897, when the Seminole council took hold of the matter and employed attorneys to represent the claimants. The attorneys so employed immediately prepared the claims and presented them orally and by printed briefs to the proper officers of the Interior Department and to committees of Congress, and finally after three years of continuous work succeeded in securing an appropriation of $186,000 by agreeing to compromise, whereby they were forced to reduce the aggregate amount of said claims, principal and interest, from $438,402.69 to $186,000. This sum was appropriated by an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900. The act making this appropriation, as will be observed, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to pay this money under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior to the claimants, if living, and if not, then to their legal heirs.

At that time it was thought the laws of Arkansas had been extended over the Seminole country, but as a matter of fact they had not. The Seminole government was still working under its own constitution, and its agreement with the United States, ratified by Congress July 1, 1898. Nevertheless, A. J. Brown was appointed administrator for the minors of deceased claimants, and gave bonds amounting in the aggregate to $300,000 for the faithful performance of his duty.

The disbursing officer for the Government, Mr. Jenkins, paid the adult claimants (all of whom were citizens of the United States) with checks, which were cashed some by the trading house of which Mr. Brown was a member, and others elsewhere. If the Indians were in debt, they paid their debts, just as they had always been in the habit of doing.

The money belonging to the minors was turned over to the administrator (Mr. Brown) and by him paid to the parents or natural guardians of said minors, who in turn paid the debts they had contracted for the support of their wards and also the attorneys' fees for services in securing the payment of said claims. Every dollar of that money handled by the administrator was honestly and properly paid out.

At first the attorneys were employed by the Seminole council, but the claim not being a tribal matter, it was subsequently deemed advisable for the claimants to act for themselves, which they did by meeting in convention and appointing a committee with full power to employ attorneys and enter into a written contract for the payment of their fees. All these matters were fully understood by the claimants and perfectly satisfactory to them. Not the slightest complaint was made or a word of objection offered by any one of them until some one discovered the fact that the judge of the United States district court had approved the reports of the administrator at chambers, while the laws of Arkansas (which did not apply to the Seminoles) required such proceedings to be approved in open court. Then the claimants were informed that the whole proceedings were irregular, and that if they would stand together the administrator would have to pay them a second time.

The disbursing officer, Mr. Jenkins, acted in good faith and in obedience to his instructions when he paid the claims.

The administrator, Mr. Brown, did the same when he paid the claimants, and so also did the United States district judge when he approved the reports and proceedings of said administrator.

The only hope of those who would undo this work, which was honestly done under a law that was supposed to be applicable, lies in the remote possibility of their being able to proceed under a new law enacted three years after the payments were made, extending the laws of Arkansas over the Seminole country.

On the 1st day of January, 1900, these claims, principal and interest, amounted to $438,402.69. In full payment thereof Congress, on May 31, 1900, appropriated the sum of $186,000, leaving a balance of $252,402.69 lawfully due the loyal Seminoles.

Would it not be more honorable for the Government to pay this balance rather than try to compel the administrator to again pay that which he has already paid? This, it seems to me, would be better for the Indians than if the Government should adopt a course calculated to impress upon their minds the fact that they are under no moral obligations to pay their honest debts.

It has ever been the custom of the trading houses in the Seminole country to trust the Indians for the necessaries of life in anticipation of their payments from the Government, and when such payments were made the Indians as a rule paid their debts, and so they did when the loyal Seminole claims were paid.

I trust, therefore, that the law as it is may be permitted to stand.

Very truly, yours,

SAML. J. CRAWFORD.

Memorandum of facts in regard to the payment of the loyal Seminole claim.

Certain individual Seminole Indians remained loyal to the United States during the war of the rebellion and suffered loss of their property from depredations by their disloyal neighbors. To compensate these loyal individuals Congress appropriated, by act approved May 31, 1900, the sum of $186,000, which sum was disbursed by James E. Jenkins, special agent, under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior dated May 7, 1901.

At the time of this disbursement the individual claimants were citizens of the United States.

Special Agent Jenkins was instructed, in making payments on behalf of deceased beneficiaries, to require administration papers from a court of proper jurisdiction. He was further instructed to make all payments by check payable to the order of the persons entitled thereto, and that the check should be placed directly in the hands of the individual beneficiaries. He was also instructed not to make any arrangements to favor in the slightest degree any merchant, trader, or other creditor, and neither they nor their representatives, nor any collector of any description were allowed to be in his office while payment was in progress.

These instructions were attempted to be complied with to the letter, but the administrator who was appointed to receive the money of the minor beneficiaries was so appointed under the laws of the State of Arkansas, which were not in force in the Seminole Nation at the time of such payment and therefore the administrator was without authority in the premises. However, Andrew Jackson Brown, who was thus appointed administrator, gave bond in the sum of $300,000.

For the purpose of securing this claim, the individual claimants, assembled in council or convention, had employed a competent attorney to conduct their case, who rendered services in that behalf for many years, and the claimants were all willing and anxious to compensate him.

These individual claimants, following the usual custom of the tribe, had contracted debts on the strength of their expected payment and in anticipation thereof with the Wewoka Trading Company and others.

In making the payments, checks were issued to those of full age and delivered to the individual beneficiaries, who, following their own inclinations, took the same to the Wewoka Trading Company and there had the checks cashed and paid their debts, including the amounts which the claimants had authorized to be paid to their attorney and were perfectly satisfied with the transaction. The beneficiaries of decedents were in like manner paid to the administrator, who settled for amount of debts contracted, in accordance with the custom of the tribe, by the parents and guardians for nurture of the minors and also paid the fair share of these minors of the amount due to the attorney for the claimants.

The administrator made up his accounts and the same were approved by Judge Gill sitting in chambers, and the matter was supposed to be finally ended.

At this time one Crane, a brother-in-law of Andrew Jackson Brown, and an ex-convict, conceived the plan of securing to himself an informer's share, under section 2103 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the theory that this money had been disbursed, so far as the attorney's compensation was concerned, in violation of that section, which share is one-half of the amount of money which might be recovered by the person sueing for the same. Upon his representations suits were instituted to recover the money paid through the administrator upon the technical ground that the order confirming the acts of the administrator had been executed in chambers instead of in open court, as required by the laws of the State of Arkansas, which were supposed to govern the proceeding. Upon these suits large sums of money have been paid from the fund to court officers, and payment of further charges amounting in the aggregate to $5,000 or over were pending at the passage of the act confirming the payments by Special Agent Jenkins and by Administrator Brown.

The improvident payment by Inspector Jenkins was that to an administrator appointed by a court having no jurisdiction. Unquestionably the right of recovery by the United States would lie against Jenkins's bond for this money if it was wrongfully paid. The confirmatory act heals this defect.

The money paid to adults was paid direct to the individuals, who were each citizens of the United States, who made such use thereof as he himself elected. The fact that the money was used in the payment of debts is not a reasonable criticism of the payment.

The money disbursed by Brown as administrator for the payment of the debts contracted by the parents and guardians for nurture of minors, was paid in accordance with the customs of the tribe and in accordance with the long-continued custom of giving credit by trading companies to the parents and guardians for nurture of those expecting funds from the Government as in the case of annuities and other payments. It has never been charged or suggested that the money so paid was not actually due to the Wewoka Trading Company, where most of the indebtedness was contracted. Every cent of the money was honestly and properly applied either by the individual beneficiaries themselves or by the administrator appointed for the purpose of receiving and applying the fund.

The proceeding instituted by the Government through the Interior Department was so instituted upon false and misleading statements on the part of the convict Crane, and have been maintained under the mistaken idea that the fund, particularly of minors, had been misapplied. This, however, is distinctly erroneous, and if the parties to whom this money has been paid in the payment of the debts of these people were required to refund the same, the individuals for whose benefit the recovery would be had would be encouraged in an unwarrantable and dishonest proceeding—that is, the repudiation of their just debts.

It is not contended but that the court which approved the accounts of the administrator, Brown, in chambers acted in good faith under the supposition that authority was vested in him to thus approve said accounts. The approving judge has never since sat in that district and never had an opportunity to approve the accounts in open court nunc pro tunc, another judge having set aside the order made in chambers, thus reopening the administrator's accounts.

It is now conceded that the appointment of Brown as administrator was without authority of law and improvidently made, and that the money of minors was paid over to him by Jenkins without legal authority. The object of the act confirming and ratifying both the action of Jenkins and the action of the administrator, Brown, was to heal these technical irregularities. The confirming act leaves to any person aggrieved the individual right of action, and it is substantially just in the premises and no more. The object of the confirmatory act was to not only relieve Special Agent Jenkins from liability, but also to confirm the improvident appointment of Brown and to confirm the act of Judge Gill, who approved his accounts in chambers instead of in open court, with the further object to prevent litigation which has already eaten deeply into the fund and which, if continued, will exhaust any part of the fund now remaining in the hands of the administrator, Brown.

BUTLER & HALE,
(For administrator).

The following is a copy of the instructions to Mr. Jenkins, under which the loyal Seminole payments were made, to wit:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, May 7, 1901.

Mr. JAMES E. JENKINS,
Special United States Indian Agent, Present.

SIR: Upon the completion of your report upon the investigation recently made by you, you are directed to proceed to Perry, Okla., in order to arrive there not later than the morning of the 13th instant, for the purpose of testifying in the case of The United States v. Asa C. Sharp.

Upon the completion of this duty, you will proceed to the Indian Territory for the purpose of making payment to the loyal Seminole Indians of the $186,000 appropriated in the Indian appropriation act approved May 31, 1900, page 22.

Report your arrival at Perry, your departure therefrom, and your arrival in the Indian Territory by wire.

Steps will at once be taken to place to your official credit the sum above referred to, in installemtns, to enable you to pay the balance of the awards made to the loyal Seminole Indians, per articles 3 and 4 of the treaty of March 21, 1866, and paragraph 14 of the agreement on December 16, 1897, such payment to be in full settlement and satisfaction of all claims under said articles and paragraph.

The roll containing the names of the persons entitled to payment, together with the census roll prepared by you, are handed you herewith.

You will make two copies of the pay roll, and, after making the payment, return two copies to this Office with your accounts. A separate account must be rendered for this payment.

In making payment in behalf of deceased beneficiaries, you will require administration papers from court of proper jurisdiction.

The shares of all who are entitled to receive and receipt for their own, but which, for any reason, you are unable to pay, should be returned to the United States Treasury, to be afterwards paid through this Office.

All payments are to be made by check, payable to the order of the persons entitled, and must be placed directly in their hands.

You are not allowed to make any arrangements to favor, in the slightest degree, and merchant, trader, or other creditor, and neither they, their representatives, nor any collector of any description are to be allowed in your office while payment is in progress.

In no case will you recognize a power of attorney.

You will be careful to make full and clear notes on the pay rolls, explaining any matters that are unusual, such as date of death of anyone who may have died since the roll was prepared, reason for returning to the Treasury the share of any person entitled, etc.

You will also be careful to enter in the column prepared for that purpose the date on which each payment is made, also to indicate the depository on which you draw your checks, and to place the number of the check opposite the name of each person paid.

Upon your arrival in the Indian Territory you will commence the payment without delay, and as soon as the first installment placed to your credit is exhausted you will wire this Office, when another installment will be placed to your credit.

Very respectfully,

A. C. TONNER,
Acting Commissioncr.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] if he will yield now for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I did not know the Senator from New Jersey had the floor.

Mr. KEAN. I did not know that I had the floor, either.

Mr. TELLER. I did not understand that the Senator from New Jersey had the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from New Jersey to address the Chair.

Mr. KEAN. But he only addressed the Chair in the time of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. TELLER. He yielded the floor.

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is recognized.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if the consideration of the conference report is to go over, I will address myself to it at some other time. I simply want to say that there is nothing in this transaction that justifies the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] or anybody else in calling it an infamous transaction. The Senator, from some statements which people have made to him, makes a statement here that I know and the committee know can not be supported. I shall, however, address myself to this matter when I have an opportunity; but I do not intend to allow the Senator from South Carolina to charge the committee with presenting an infamous transaction here. He may do it, I suppose, but he shall not do it, at least, without having a denial put upon record by me, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I was not aware that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] had any interest in this matter at all. As I said a moment ago, the matter appeared to me extraordinary; and if the word "infamous" is too strong I will use some milder phrase. I will think up one, probably, or try to do so, and insert it in my remarks. But what appears to me to be strange, unaccountable, unreasonable, and unjust is that Congress should step in and by enactment cause to be stopped the litigation and lawsuits now pending in the courts to recover from this man Brown money that is claimed or alleged to be due to these Indian orphans; and that these lawsuits should be stopped and the action of Brown and Jenkins should be ratified, when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior send an official communication, in which they point out the fact that Brown, as the agent of the Wewoka Trading Company, paid to himself or to his own concern or his own store $72,783.24 of this money, and then paid to some one—I do not know on what pretense or for what reason—$27,392.82 out of the $186,000 appropriated by Congress to settle these just claims—I suppose they must have been just, although some lawyer may have manipulated them, but I will take it for granted that they were honest and just claims—I say it is extraordinary to my mind and unreasonable; but I will stop for fear my adjectives may get too hot. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. I will not allow the Senator to assert that I have been interested in this claim.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not say that. I said I was not aware that the Senator was interested in this matter.

Mr. TELLER. I have got only the interest in it which any Senator who is a member of the committee would have. We attempted to discharge our duties properly, and we know more about this case than does the Senator from South Carolina. I assert here that there is nothing disreputable in this case in any shape or manner.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why, then, not let the court settle it?

Mr. TELLER. We propose to let the court settle it. We have put that in ex industria that it should not prevent anybody from going to the court. Even if the Senator is a cornfield lawyer, he ought to know that. We could not take that right away even if we had tried to do so. It is one of the rights of these people. They are not Indians; every one of them is a citizen of the United States. The Government of the United States can bring as many suits as it chooses, and each individual can bring his suit.

I will not, however, go into this question now; but the Senator from South Carolina, from what he has just stated as facts—which I do not believe are facts—must have a very unfortunate opinion of the transaction, and he must have a very unfortunate opinion of the committee, or he must believe the committee dishonest—one or the other.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Colorado is angry, and I have too much respect and admiration for him to in any wise say or do anything to offend him or give him a reasonable excuse for any such language.

Mr. TELLER. I do not allow anybody to taunt me with dishonesty, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not charged the Senator with dishonesty.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, am I recognized?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 11, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 9, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AMENDING SECTION 3646, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5811) to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885, as amended by act of March 23, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885, as amended by act of March 23, 1906, be amended by striking out the words "check or warrant" wherever said words appear in said amended act, and by substituting in lieu thereof the words "disbursing officer's check," so as to make the section read as follows:

"SEC. 3646. Whenever any original disbursing officer's check is lost, stolen, or destroyed, the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the officer issuing the same, after the expiration of six months and within three years from the date of such disbursing officer's check, to issue a duplicate thereof upon the execution of such bond to indemnify the United States as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That when such original disbursing officer's check does not exceed in amount the sum of $50 the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the issuance of a duplicate at any time after the expiration of thirty days and within three years from the date of such disbursing officer's check."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman explain what this bill does.

Mr. DALZELL. At this present session of Congress we passed a law amending section 3646 of the Revised Statutes, which section of the Revised Statutes imposed a limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury upon issuing lost checks.

Mr. MANN. I thought it increased the authority.

Mr. DALZELL. It increased the authority by removing the limitation. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury says the words used in that amending statute were too broad; that we used the words "check or warrant," whereas we ought to have used only the words "disbursing officers' checks," and that the purpose sought to be accomplished by the amendment has been in part defeated by reason thereof, and it is to correct that error which he claims is in the law which passed that this bill is presented.

Mr. MANN. I can not quite understand how using words too broad defeats the purpose of the amendment. This is restrictive. We have had so much trouble heretofore about these lost checks that I want to see the Secretary of the Treasury have as broad power as possible.

Mr. DALZELL. So do I; and he will have as broad power as we want him to have, he claims, under the law as it is now proposed to amend it.

Mr. MANN. How does he know what power we want him to have? And you are limiting his power by this legislation.

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman stated.

Mr. DALZELL. The words necessary to be used in order to give him the power that we want to give him by the act which we passed at this session of Congress ought to have been "disbursing officers' checks." Now, we did not use the words "disbursing officers' checks," but used the words "check or warrant."

Mr. MANN. Does the Secretary of the Treasury hold that the word "check" does not include disbursing officers' checks?

Mr. DALZELL. The Secretary of the Treasury holds that the law substantially has been wrong for about twenty years. I was the introducer of the bill, and when I introduced the bill I followed the language of the Revised Statutes we wanted to amend. Now the Secretary says that the language ought to be "disbursing officers' checks" instead of "check or warrant."

Mr. PAYNE. What he says is now it includes warrants passing between officers of the Government, and in order to have those renewed and have a duplicate issued, it requires the officer to give bond, as the statute is to-day. They discovered it since we amended it, and the statute has been that way all the time, and this is simply to relieve those warrants issued between Government officers and the officers having to give bond and security against duplicates.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman, after his lucid explanation, it is just as clear as mud; but if he insists he has investigated it and it is extending the power, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. DALZELL. I am perfectly clear about it.

Mr. LACEY. I know what my own purpose was when I voted for the bill, and that was to allow all sorts of Government checks to be duplicated under the limitation and authority. For instance, you get a draft drawn by the Treasurer or assistant treasurer of the United States on the assistant treasurer at New York and that is lost. Now, we do not want to come to Congress to get authority to get a duplicate, and that bill was introduced undertaking to cover that sort of a check. Now you limit it to disbursing checks and disbursing checks only and do away with the advantage of the bill we passed——

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. All checks to which the gentleman refers are disbursing checks, and on all those checks, of course, duplicates are issued upon proper indemnity being given, but there must be proper indemnity.

Mr. LACEY. That is, providing the amount is under $2,500. But suppose the amount is over that?

Mr. DALZELL. We struck out the limitation upon the amount in the law we passed. The indemnity clause still stays, but we struck out the amount. In the old law the Secretary of the Treasury could not issue a duplicate check for an amount over $2,500.

The law as we amended it allowed him to issue a duplicate check, without reference to the amount, upon proper indemnity being furnished. Now, then, he says—and he is correct in that—that the operation of that law is to compel him to issue certain duplicates upon indemnity being given; but the language of the law also covers warrants passing between officers of the Department to be duplicated on giving indemnity, and therefore it is not a restriction that is here, but an enlargement of the Secretary's authority.

In further explanation I submit the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 8, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PAYNE: I think a matter of very great importance to this Department has escaped your attention. Under the law as it now stands the Treasurer can not issue a duplicate warrant for six months. There is scarcely a week when duplicate warrants are not well-nigh necessary. I will give one illustration: The Apalachicola National Bank has purchased $50,000, 2 per cent Government bonds as a basis for a deposit of that amount. The bonds were deposited with the Treasurer. A warrant was sent the bank. It has not been received. No duplicate can be issued for two months, nor can the bank withdraw its bonds. There are a dozen similar cases pending. There was one amendment passed at this session, but by a grievous oversight on the part of the originator of the bill, and an even worse oversight on the part of this Department, the amendment was made to apply to warrants as well as to disbursing officers' checks. It should have applied to disbursing officers' checks only. I wrote you about this some time ago. I think the bill has been reported, and I wish you would urge its passage.

Very truly, yours, L. M. SHAW.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

For revolving doors for entrances to the Capitol building, $6,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota about this matter of revolving doors. Can the gentleman tell us how much they cost apiece and how many we are to have?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Woods, Superintendent of the Capitol, stated that he intended or wanted to have constructed four revolving doors, at the north and south ends of the building on the basement floor. Then I asked him:

What do you call the basement floor?

And Mr. Woods replied:

The ground floor.

Then I asked him:

At the main entrance on the west?

Mr. WOODS. That is the one opening out on the terrace. The other is on the main rotunda entrance at the east. We have a great deal of trouble in the winter season with the ordinary fly door.

The CHAIRMAN. I was thinking about this door which we all enter in front of the House post-office.

Mr. WOODS. When the doors on the east are opened it causes a strong draft, and that causes a great deal of complaint. I think you can see the necessity of putting revolving doors on the west side.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you estimate for these doors, separately?

Mr. WOODS. About $1,500 apiece, I think. The rotunda door would cost about $2,400 or $2,500. That has to be treated specially, on account of the architecture of the rotunda. That would be the most expensive door.

Mr. BARTLETT. The reason I asked the question is that I have made some inquiry about it, and I understand that these revolving doors which we see at the entrances of the large hotels cost about $650 apiece. That is the reason I asked how many we were to have. I understand we are only to have four, for which we have to pay $6,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Superintendent informed the committee that the door at the post-office entrance, where there are no architectural difficulties in the way of constructing a plain door, would cost about $900. The door at the Rotunda here will be a very expensive door on account of the formation of the doors that are now there and which, of course, will have to remain there. It is on account of the peculiar architectural difficulties that will have to be overcome in these different places that the doors will be a little more expensive than they would if constructed in an ordinary building.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have the utmost confidence in the Superintendent of the Capitol, Mr. Woods, and know he will get them as cheaply as he can. I wanted to know how many there were, because it occurred to me that it was a very large amount, growing out of the fact doubtless that this is Government property and out of the fact that, as I understand it, these doors are patented. I merely wanted the information, because it seemed to me that in comparison with the cost of these doors put in at other places the figures were rather high.

The Clerk read as follows:

Toward the construction of the fireproof building for committee rooms and offices for the House of Representatives, provided for in the sundry civil appropriations act approved March 3, 1903, including not exceeding $500 for the purchase of necessary technical and other books, $500,000, to continue available until expended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A day or two ago there was some question raised in the House as to whether a bill passed authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to have constructed a vessel at a cost not to exceed a certain amount, giving authority to make contracts, or whether it was necessary, in order to give him authority, to appropriate the full sum of money or further authorization. I asked the Comptroller of the Treasury in reference to that matter, and I desire to have read at the Clerk's desk the opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, before that letter is read I want to submit to the gentleman from Illinois and to ask him that he withhold the reading of that letter for the present. The letter is one that I have seen embracing the opinion of the Comptroller on that question. That did not involve the position at all, but I have seen a letter this morning from the Post-Office Department which I want to submit to the gentleman from Illinois, which does involve the same question; and if the judgment expressed in the opinion of the Comptroller is correct, if it is the law, then it takes out from under existing law the Departments of the Government in respect to contracting for material and for everything for which there is no appropriation. I refer particularly to the deficiency estimate which the Speaker received this morning from the Post-Office Department; and I would like to have the gentleman withhold the letter from the RECORD until I can have a further conference with him in regard to the matter. It is a matter of far greater importance than we understood it to be a few days ago when the gentleman first presented it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to withhold the letter; but I may say to the gentleman that I do not think he yet has appreciated the distinction which I draw, and which the Comptroller would draw, and which I think the gentleman from Minnesota will draw, when he comes to a further consideration of the subject, between appropriating and the matter of contracting for the construction or authority to construct a vessel.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me state this to illustrate what I mean. Here is a service authorized by Congress, statutory, requiring the head of a Department to contract for certain materials or supplies. Appropriations are made upon the estimates of the head of the Department asking the amount that will be required. His judgment proves defective, or, for some reason which could not be anticipated at the time of making the estimates, the appropriation is not sufficient. Now, the logic of the ruling or opinion of the Comptroller is that the Department should go on contracting, regardless of the amount appropriated, and say to the contractor: "If Congress fails to appropriate the money, you can go into the Court of Claims and of your own motion obtain judgment, which judgment will draw 4 per cent from the time you get it until Congress appropriates the money."

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The logic of the situation does not go to that extent at all. I have no objection to withholding the letter for the present.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can show you the letter from the Postmaster-General, which shows conclusively that fact.

Mr. MANN. I may be able to convince the gentleman if the Comptroller did not convince him. I did not have to convince the Comptroller. I did not see him; I simply sent him a letter. I wish they would return the letter to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. I notice here a provision for a sum of not more than $500 for books of a technical character in connection with the construction of this building over here. For whom are those books, and what is the necessity for them?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are books used by the Architect and Superintendent of the Capitol and by the architects and the men who are employed in drafting the plans of the interior, for the construction. They relate particularly to detail plans and drawings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are purely for the use of our employees of the Architect of the Capitol?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, yes; entirely so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF THE COLLECTION OF REVENUE FROM SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the following paragraph, relating to land matters, be passed without prejudice.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand the gentleman only wants to pass the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa kindly specify the lines he would like to have passed without prejudice?

Mr. LACEY. Down to line 15 on page 73.

Mr. TAWNEY. On the subject of the public lands. That covers how many pages? Will the gentleman indicate what he desires to have passed?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And let him also indicate why he wants it passed.

Mr. LACEY. To line 18, page 73.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the reason for this?

Mr. LACEY. The subject will involve some discussion——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman kindly state his request?

Mr. LACEY. If there is any objection at all, I will only ask that the first paragraph be passed without prejudice.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. On what page?

Mr. LACEY. Page 66.

Mr. TAWNEY. The first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the lines from 5 to 9, on page 66, be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, while we are on this matter, a number of the Members of the House have requested me to have passed without prejudice all of the items under the head of the United States Geological Survey, to be taken up on Monday. There are a number of Members who will be absent from the House this afternoon, and they have requested me to pass that until Monday or until the matter may be called up—all of the items under the head of the Geological Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, asks unanimous consent that all of the items under the general head of the United States Geological Survey, beginning on page 73, be passed without prejudice until Monday.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have some remarks in writing that I desire to make on the general topic covering all the branches of that paragraph of the bill. I should like to have the privilege of speaking briefly and then putting these observations into the RECORD.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will cheerfully consent to the gentleman's request.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not be here on Monday.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will consent that the gentleman may have the time to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that Monday will be District day.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I ask that it go over until the next session at which the sundry civil bill is taken up.

Mr. BARTLETT. That will be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to be recognized now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the subject of the Geological Survey is one that the people of Ohio, and very especially the people whom I have the honor to represent here, feel a great deal of interest in. The State of Ohio has expended very large sums of money in the development of the survey of the State, and has now for a number of years been cooperating with the General Government by an appropriation of money which is expended practically in the administration of the Geological Survey department of the Federal Government. Therefore it is natural that they should very greatly regret any reduction of the expenditure in that direction. It is because of my interest in the matter that I have asked permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if the document that he intends to insert in the RECORD is the brief that has been prepared by the Geological Survey and distributed here among Members of the House?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know whether it has been generally distributed or not, but I will state to the gentleman that I sought a conversation with a member of the corps, and he came and had a talk with me at the hotel, and I made memoranda of the subjects that I desired to have the figures and information about, and he has furnished me with the document which I propose to print.

Mr. TAWNEY. The reason I ask is that, judging from its appearance, it is a copy of one that I myself have, and which has been handed to me by a Member of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it is more than likely.

Mr. TAWNEY. And one that has been very generally distributed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only use it for the purpose of attracting the attention of the House, and I trust that the great States that are interested in this matter and which are not so much interested in a great many other matters that seem extravagant in this bill, will see to it that this particularly important branch of the public service shall not be impaired in its usefulness.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The matter referred to heretofore is as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS FOR GEOLOGICAL SURVEY, 1906–7.

Total appropriation, 1905–6, $1,484,420. Reduction made by the Committee on Appropriations, $307,000, or over one-fifth.

So great a reduction for the maintenance of one of the permanent bureaus of the Government will seriously cripple it. The injury is not for this year alone. Several years will be required to gather together again and train the skilled surveyors in mining engineering, geologic surveying, topographic surveying, hydrographic surveying, etc., who will be affected. This Survey has been a bureau of the Department of the Interior for twenty-five years. From time to time its appropriations have been increased to meet the growth of the country, as have appropriations for other bureaus. The Secretary of the Department and the Director of the Bureau had no prior intimation of the intention of the committee to make this reduction, and therefore had no opportunity to explain to the committee how vitally so great a reduction in appropriations and approved estimates would affect the Survey. Every item in the bill should be restored to the estimates, which means to restore the amount appropriated last year with one or two exceptions noted below.

The following reductions were made and restorations asked:

Topographic surveys.—Appropriations last year and submitted in approved estimates, $350,000; reported from committee, $300,000—a reduction of $50,000. There has been a strong and persistent demand for increased topographic surveying from all parts of the country, and an increase of $50,000 at least is essential if important work, asked through Members of Congress and others, is to be carried out. This item should not only be restored to $350,000, but should be increased to $400,000.

Surveys of forest reserves.—Current appropriation and approved for 1906–7, $130,000. Reported from committee, $100,000. Should be restored to full amount, for the reason that of the total area (98,000,000 acres) only 44,000,000 acres have been surveyed, and the lack of maps is holding back the proper valuation of the lands and all plans for the management of the reserves by the Government.

Preparation of report on mineral resources.—Appropriated last year, $75,000. On account of the extra expenses involved in the investigation of the recovery of valuable metals from black-sand deposits, this was increased to $100,000 by an addition of $25,000 in the urgent deficiency bill, approved February 27, 1906. The amount asked for 1906–7, and submitted in approved estimates, was $75,000. Reported by committee, $50,000; a reduction of $25,000 from the estimates as necessary and of $50,000 from the total appropriated for present fiscal year. This item should be restored to $75,000, which is 25 per cent less than the total amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906.

Gaging streams.—Appropriated for several seasons past and submitted in approved estimates, $200,000. Reported from committee, $100,000; a cut of one-half. This item should be restored to the former figure. The proposed decrease will make necessary the abandonment of more than one-half of the river stations, the equipment of which will fall into disuse and become worthless, and the records of which will be broken and thereby lose greatly in value.

Investigation of fuel resources.—Appropriation for current year, $202,000; reported from committee, $100,000; a reduction of $102,000. The amount recommended by the Department was $250,000, including $200,000 for operating expenses and $50,000 to cover the cost of additional equipment and the removal of the plant from its present site. Both the removal and the additional equipment are necessary to the proper work of the plant, and the appropriation should be raised to the $250,000, as recommended by the Department. The reduction proposed by the committee would mean the abandonment of many unfinished investigations of far-reaching importance in relation to coals and lignites underlying 70,000 square miles of land owned by the Government, the utilization of the peats and low-grade coals in many parts of the country, and the comparison of these with other special fuels.

Stationery, printing and binding, and contingent supplies.—The bill provides in the first clause for the payment, out of the appropriations to the Geological Survey, for necessary expenses, including telegrams, furniture, stationery, telephone service, and all other necessary articles required in the field. The estimates show that $50,000 will be required for the above items for office and field use, that would have been paid from appropriations for the Department of the Interior except for the Comptroller's decision and this legislation. The effect of this amendment, which is an essential one in view of a decision by the Comptroller of the Treasury, will be a further reduction in the lump-sum appropriations for topographic surveying, gauging streams, etc., of $50,000. The total reduction in funds available to field work is therefore $307,000 plus $50,000, or $357,000.

Statement given by the Director of the Geological Survey in hearing before the committee.

STATIONERY SUPPLIES.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, the Geological Survey received, through the Department of the Interior, stationery supplies, nonrepay	$10,162.53
Repay from Survey appropriations	3,921.73
Purchased in open market, under authority from the Secretary of the Interior, payment being made from Survey appropriations	342.83
Total	14,427.09
Allowing for probable increase for the two years 1906 and 1907, it is estimated that the Survey will need, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, stationery supplies amounting to	17,500.00

PRINTING AND BINDING.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, the Geological Survey received, through the Department of the Interior, supplies (printed and bound, including stationery forms, blanks, blank books, etc.) for which it was charged	21,262.62
Allowing for probable increase for the two years 1906 and 1907, it is estimated that the Survey will need, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, supplies (printed and bound, including stationery forms, blanks, blank books, etc.) amounting to	27,500.00

CONTINGENT SUPPLIES.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, the Geological Survey received, through the Department of the Interior, contingent supplies, nonrepay	8,639.39
Purchased in open market, under authority from the Secretary of the Interior, payment being made from Survey appropriations	11,593.19
Repay from Survey appropriations	194.64
Total	20,427.22
Allowing for probable increase for the two years 1906 and 1907, it is estimated that the Survey will need, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, for contingent supplies	25,000.00

ESTIMATED NEEDS.

For stationery supplies	17,500.00
For printing and binding	27,500.00
For contingent supplies	25,000.00
Total for fiscal year 1907	70,000.00

TOPOGRAPHIC SURVEYS.

Sundry civil bill:
Appropriation recommended	$400,000
Current appropriation	350,000
Reported by committee	300,000

The total area of the United States is 3,024,880 square miles, of which 955,996 square miles have been mapped topographically, or 32 per cent of the total area. The topographic map is the essential basis on which to classify the lands as required in the enabling act of the Geological Survey, and to study the mineral resources, the water supply, the forest resources, soil surveys, good-roads improvements, and on which to plan great engineering works, as the location of railways, sources of water supply of cities, military defenses of the nation, etc.

About fifteen of the larger States, including New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Maine, Maryland, Kentucky, Illinois, Michigan, California, etc., find this work of such vital importance that their legislatures appropriate annually sums ranging from $5,000 to $25,000 to aid the Government in hastening the completion of this work. The Congressional delegations from those States, as well as those from other States, are therefore vitally interested in order that a reduction in topographic appropriations shall not affect continuation of this work. Elsewhere the demands for this work come chiefly from those interested in the development of mineral resources, water supply, and water powers.

Argument has been used that the States should make these surveys, as they are willing to appropriate for cooperation. This is impossible. Several States—notably Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Kentucky—attempted to organize their own surveys, but found that they were not able to do so on a large enough basis to command the services of the most skilled engineers, and to train and maintain the necessary corps of topographers, and procure the necessary uniformity in the maps produced for all States. After costly and unsatisfactory experience and delay, such State efforts have been abandoned.

All those States realized that the Federal Government alone can build up an organization competent to handle the work and carry it forward on one systematic plan, and prefer to aid the Government by appropriations to its use. The making of these surveys and maps is conceded in this as well as in all other countries to be a national matter.

The impression has gone forth that topography could stand a reduction because topographic mapping was ahead of geologic mapping and might wait until the latter caught up. This is utterly misleading and incorrect. In places the topographic surveys are slightly in advance of geologic surveys, because the demands for topographic surveying have been for other purposes than the study of mineral resources, as the study of the soils in many parts of the country; studies of the forests in the forest reservations of the West and in New Hampshire, Maine, and the Appalachian region; studies of the water resources along the Piedmont country of the Atlantic coast, and for the planning of public works and exploitation of natural resources in general.

FORESTRY SURVEYS.

Sundry civil bill:
Current appropriation	$130,000
Reported by committee	100,000
Should be restored to	130,000

It is essential for the intelligent care and study of forest reserves that accurate maps be provided on which the boundaries and kinds of timber can be platted, routes selected for roads or trails, or other public or private development. With the maps estimates may be made of the amount of timber, its commercial value, and plans prepared for improving the stand or for the sale of the mature growth. The mapping and geologic examination of forest reserves are necessary in order to determine what areas are more valuable for their minerals or for cultivation than for the timber, in order that such tracts may be opened up to settlement.

Forest reserves are usually in the most inaccessible places and in the roughest parts of the country. For a large part of the reserves no surveys of any kind have ever been made; consequently no adequate maps are available.

During the past year over 36,000 square miles of timbered area was added to the reserves, while the survey of forested areas by the Geological Survey only amounted to 7,824 square miles. It is thus evident that the reserves are increasing more rapidly than the mapping can be carried forward with the funds provided by Congress.

The total area of forest reserves in the United States on April 1 was nearly 100,000,000 acres (98,836,383), while the area that had been mapped by the Geological Survey only amounted to a little more than 44,000,000 acres. The cost of mapping the reserves ranges from 1 to 4 cents per acre, depending on local conditions, the average being about 2 cents per acre, an amount which seems trivial when compared with the actual values of the timbered areas, which range from about $3 to $50 per acre.

In order to prevent trespassing or illegal timber cutting it is necessary that the boundaries of the reserves be surveyed and marked. The total linear miles in the boundaries of existing reserves is over 20,000. Of these, the Geological Survey has marked but little more than one-tenth, while requests from other branches of the Government now on file call for the marking of over 3,000 additional miles of line.

Besides the requests for boundary surveys, there are also requests for topographic mapping of over 15,000 square miles of timbered country. It is therefore evident that if the best interests of the Government are to be served the appropriation for forest-reserve surveys should be increased rather than diminished.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry civil bill:
Appropriation recommended	$75,000
Current appropriation	100,000
Reported by committee	50,000

During the past few years there has been a rapid growth in the development of mineral lands throughout the United States, resulting in a very large increase in the amount of the mineral production and number of producers. This has caused a much larger demand not only for the statistical reports, but for information relating to the location, occurrence, value, and use of the various economic minerals. With this increase in the mineral production of the country there has been a corresponding increase in the correspondence and field work necessary for the preparation of the reports. It is essential for this division to keep in touch with all the old and new mining operations, to keep track of mineral localities of all kinds, and to make many special investigations relating to certain minerals in order to be in a position to publish complete statistical reports and to answer the many inquiries that are constantly being received regarding minerals and mineral lands.

These requests by their scope indicate a proper and increasing appreciation of the value of these investigations and furnish proof of the need of their continuance and extension.

Since 1901, when the sum of $50,000 was first appropriated, the value of the mineral production has increased over 50 per cent, or in a somewhat larger ratio than the increase has been in the appropriation. The sum of $75,000, the amount appropriated for this work during the last fiscal year, represents less than one two-thousandths of 1 per cent of the annual value of the products of our mines. It will be impossible to keep up the work of the division in accord with the needs of the country on an appropriation smaller than $75,000.

The closest estimates for the work of the next fiscal year show that the sum required for salaries alone will be	$56,970
For administration, apportioned to office of the Director	5,255
Making a total of	62,225

To this must be added all expenses of printing blank forms, lists of mines, etc., which only during the last year have been charged against this appropriation. It is also absolutely necessary to provide for certain traveling and miscellaneous expenses, as it is impossible to secure all the desired statistical returns by mail, particularly from new mining operations, the owners of which are not already familiar with the character of the work carried on by this division. If the appropriation as estimated is not made, it will be necessary to reduce materially the present force. Experts and clerical salaries to the sum of $18,000 would have to be dropped or transferred from the work of this division, as traveling and miscellaneous expenses, such as printing, telegrams, purchase of supplies, etc., must be provided for in any event. It will not be possible to gather data complete, and the preparation and publication of the various chapters will be much delayed. Next to accuracy, the chief value of these reports lies in prompt publication. If the appropriation is reduced to the sum of $50,000, it will be impossible to keep the work up to the standard or to publish the results in time to be of value except as history.

GAUGING STREAMS.

Sundry civil bill:
Appropriation recommended	$200,000
Current appropriation	200,000
Reported by committee	100,000

The appropriation for gauging streams is used for the maintenance of the extensive studies that the Geological Survey has made into the amount and character of the water flowing in interstate rivers, its availability for power development, and for municipal, irrigation, and industrial purposes. The immediate object of this work is to show to the people of the country their water resources and how these resources may be better used and protected, and by furnishing this definite information to stimulate the development of water powers and conserving systems, and thereby assist in the industrial building up of localities which, without these data, could not induce the investment of the necessary capital.

The work is also of value to cities that are seeking for water supplies of suitable amount and character, and in the construction of waterways, like the New York barge canal, it has resulted in the saving of at least $100,000 and years of delay.

In the development of rivers for navigation, information concerning the amount of water and the amount and nature of the sediment which it carries is necessary in determining the size and grade of the channel in plans for permanent navigation improvements.

This work must be conducted by the General Government, because the most of our important rivers are interstate, and the value of these streams is national in both extent and character. Nor can it be performed by private individuals, for such work is short lived, irregular, always done for some local, special purpose, and the results are seldom available to the public and never accepted as impartial. The work of the Federal Government is, on the other hand, uniformly accepted because it is unbiased. In confirmation of this it may be cited that each year since 1901 several million dollars have been invested in power plants and mills as a result of official data obtained from the Geological Survey reports.

Investigations of the character of underground waters, and the depth at which they can be found in quantities sufficient for domestic and industrial purposes, constitute one of the important features of the work under this appropriation.

Expenditures from the appropriation for the fiscal year 1905 "For gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States, and for the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells, and the preparation of reports upon the best methods of utilizing the water resources."

Arid States, west of one hundredth meridian:
Gauging surface streams	$51,945.01
Underground waters	22,738.04
		$74,683.05
Humid States, east of one hundredth meridian:
Gauging surface streams	58,567.12
Underground waters	13,920.65
River profile surveys	830.23
		73,318.00
Computations, maps, reports, inspection, and administration, Washington office		37,548.96
Quality of water (hydro-economics)		14,286.26
Unexpended		163.73
		200,000.00

In the Western States the gauging of streams involved in the irrigation projects is paid for out of the reclamation fund, but under the reclamation act no expenditures can be lawfully made except those to be charged against lands irrigated. Accordingly the greater portion of the stream gauging in the Western States must be carried on by specific appropriation in the sundry civil bill, and can not be paid from the reclamation fund.

APPROPRIATION FOR THE INVESTIGATION OF FUELS.

Sundry civil bill:
Appropriation recommended	$250,000
Current appropriation	202,000
Reported by committee	100,000

1. Purposes of the investigation:

(1) To lessen the waste of the nation's fuel supply, by showing how these fuels can be mined and used more efficiently.

(2) To extend the nation's supply of fuel, and lessen the transportation cost in fuel by indicating how lignite, peat, and other materials, now little used, may become valuable as fuels in portions of the country having no ordinary coal.

(3) To find how to prevent the spontaneous combustion of coals in storage, on ships, naval stations, at the mines, etc.

(4) To remedy the loss sustained in the production of fine coal in mining through slacking, etc.

(5) To demonstrate the saving of by-products now wasted in the manufacture of coke, which if completely saved would be worth at present prices more than $50,000,000 yearly, and prevent large imports of such by-products.

2. The present waste of fuel:

(a) Approximately 25 to 50 per cent of the possible coal supply is now lost by being left underground or wasted before reaching furnace.

(b) Of many Mississippi Valley and western coals, from 30 to 50 per cent of the total product mined comes out in the form of "slack," which is often sold at less than cost, or accumulates and is burned about the mines.

(c) Of the fine portion of these Mississippi Valley and western coals put into furnaces, often 10 to 25 per cent is lost in the ashes unconsumed.

(d) Of all the coal actually burned, about 5 per cent of its heat units are actually converted into work.

(e) In the coking of 40,000,000 tons of coal yearly there are now wasted ammonium sulphate enough to fertilize our crops, creosote enough to preserve our timbers, pitch and tar enough to roof our houses and briquette our slack or waste coals.

3. Some benefits resulting from this work.—It has demonstrated—

(1) The possibility of utilizing for power purposes the large and undeveloped areas of lignite and low-grade coals of the West and Southwest.

(2) The practicability of using in gas producers for power purposes ordinary bituminous coals, and of thus obtaining from each ton of coal more than two and one-half times as much power as is obtainable in ordinary steam-power plants.

(3) The possibility of making coke from a number of coals not considered generally as coking coals.

Some of these results are not only new, but were believed to be impracticable when these investigations were begun. These and other results are worth to the country many hundred times the total cost of this work.

4. Importance of increasing the appropriation:

(1) The value of the results already obtained.

(2) The importance of the investigations now pending. (See sections 1 and 2, above.)

(3) The enormous yearly waste in the production and use of coal. (See section 2, above.)

(2) The fact that these fuel supplies are the basis of all the country's great manufacturing industries, and are the main source of heat and light for all the country.

(5) The magnitude of the financial interests involved (these fuels cost the people of the United States $1,500,000,000 yearly).

These all combine to show the importance of continuing these investigations on a larger scale, as the annual money losses to the people from this large waste and lack of efficiency constitute a large per cent of this enormous expenditure.

The cost of removing the plant from its present location (in the public park at St. Louis) and necessary additional equipment will be $50,000. The operating expenses of the plant now average $15,000 monthly; the cost of necessary additional experts and incidental expenses for investigating the following subjects will amount to more than $2,000 monthly additional, or $204,000 for the year:

(a) Briquetting the dry coals and lignites of the West and Southwest.

(b) The utilization of the peat beds in the northern Mississippi Valley and New England States, and those in the great swamp regions bordering the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

(c) Saving the by-products from coke.

(d) Improvements in the quality of coal by washing and other methods.

(e) Investigations of the use of different explosives in the presence of coal dust and coal gas, and the prevention of accidents therefrom.

Why this work should be done by the Government:

(1) The Government itself still owns about 70,000 square miles of coal lands in the Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming, and other States, of which but little is known concerning the character and value of the coals and lignites.

(2) The present terrible waste in the fuel resources of the country is becoming a matter of serious national concern. The prevention of this waste is worthy of the best efforts of the Government.

(3) These investigations deal with one of the basal industries of the country—with the fundamental problems having to do with the nation's fuel supplies.

(4) Other industries and all classes of citizens, including the coal producers and the coal consumers, are interested in the proper solution of these problems which serve as a basis of the production of heat, power, and light.

(5) The Government is the only organization that can be reasonably expected to investigate problems of such general interest.

(6) No State should be expected to conduct these investigations, for the reason that the general results would be of almost equal value to other coal-producing States and to all the neighboring coal-consuming States, while the great cost of the work would fall on one State, and among the different States there would be great and unnecessary costly duplication.

(7) Private corporations may make such examinations for their own special purposes; but their examinations are incomplete, made for private purposes, and would not be accepted even if made public.

(8) The Government's investigations command confidence as giving both to the producers and consumers impartial information as to the correct values of different classes of coals and the purposes for which they can be used most efficiently.

(9) The demonstration of the fact that by improved processes 1 pound of bituminous coal may be made to yield power now requiring 2 to 3 pounds; and investigations as to the prevention of spontaneous combustion of coals, with a view to their safe storage on board ship or elsewhere can not fail to be of value to the Navy and other Departments of the Government which now expend several millions of dollars yearly for fuels.

(10) Inasmuch as these investigations are (1) indicating how even the good coals of the country can be used more efficiently, and (2) are making available for efficient use through improved processes many low-grade fuels in remote regions, they are enormously increasing the fuel wealth of the country.

(11) Agriculture and mining are two fundamental industries, and they receive the fostering care of the Government in every civilized country. In the United States agricultural education and agricultural investigation are generously cared for by the Federal Government. The Government now spends about $1,000,000, and will soon be spending $1,500,000, yearly in the several States for agricultural experiments in addition to the large expenditure for agricultural investigations by the Department at Washington. In like manner, these fuel investigations, as representing our greatest mining industry, and as the basis of so many other important industries, deserve the liberal treatment of the Government.

(12) Germany, France, Austria, Switzerland, and other European countries, as a result of such investigations by each of the several Governments are lessening the waste and conserving their national supply of fuels. And confidence in the results of such European governmental investigations is greatly helping to introduce the products of these countries into the foreign markets.

APPROPRIATION FOR THE INVESTIGATION OF STRUCTURAL MATERIALS.

Sundry civil bill:

Appropriation recommended	$100,000
Reported by committee	50,000

These investigations are to be conducted in connection with the Geological Survey, but under a board on which are representatives of the Navy Department, the War Department (Isthmian Canal Commission and Corps of Engineers), and the Treasury Department (Supervising Architect.) This arrangement will prevent unnecessary duplication in the work.

The purposes of these investigations are:

(1) An investigation of (a) the nature and extent of the materials available for use in building and construction work, giving special attention to materials available for Government work; (b) where they can be best obtained, and (c) how they can be used most efficiently, under different conditions; (d) their strength at different temperatures, and the fire-resisting qualities of materials; (e) strength of steel frame of buildings at different high temperatures, and how the steel can be protected best from fire by inclosing it with different materials; (f) extent to which concrete, made from cement and local materials, can be safely and efficiently used under different conditions; (g) materials in different parts of the country suitable for the manufacture of cement, and other similar problems.

(2) The publication of these results for the benefit of the general public.

The urgent need for this work:

The fire and earthquake experiences of the last few years have shown the lack and urgent need of accurate data concerning the strength, fire-resisting, and other properties of building materials, and the need of revising our systems of construction and building laws.

The Government is now expending $20,000,000, and the country is expending $1,000,000,000 yearly in building and construction work.

As indicating the need of fireproofing and fire-resistance investigations, it may be stated that: (1) During the past ten years losses from fires in the United States aggregated $1,250,000,000; (2) the insurance companies paid out during this period $897,000,000, and it is reasonable to assume that the premiums paid during this period by the people of the country for protection against fires exceeded these figures.

The Geological Survey investigations of the past year have indicated great possibilities in increased economy and safety. A number of architects and engineers have estimated that a thorough knowledge of the materials of construction and fireproofing, and the resulting increased economies in our systems of construction, may be expected to save annually more than 5 per cent of these total expenditures.

This would mean saving annually to the Government a million dollars or more, and to the people of the country many million dollars in this building and construction work. This saving will come mainly from (1) improvements in the quality of materials; (2) use of less material, without lessening the safety; (3) use of new and cheaper materials, largely prepared from local supplies of material, with steel in reenforced concrete, etc. And still more important would be the increase in safety from fire and in general efficiency.

Indirectly the results of these investigations should largely diminish the cost of insurance, and also the loss of life and property from fire, and they will serve as a basis of wiser building laws. In these respects they will benefit not only the Goverment, but also every State, city, county, and small town and every citizen who builds a house. The greater safety and economy may be expected from the use of new building material, such as cement, concrete, steel, and terra cotta, and new combinations of old materials; but recent fires and earthquakes have shown how inadequate is our knowledge concerning these and how costly is our ignorance.

The Government should conduct these investigations:

(1) Because the Government is itself interested in building and construction work to the extent of $20,000,000 per annum; (2) every State, county, city, and town is interested, but no one of these should be expected to make investigations for the benefit of all when all alike are to be benefited by the result; (3) every citizen is interested; (4) the Government work is impartial, commands the confidence of all parties. And the doing of this work by the Government not only guarantees greater accuracy, owing to better facilities, but avoids endless, costly duplication.

The reasons for the increase in appropriations are that:

The present appropriation is inadequate for the large amount of work to be done and out of proportion to the magnitude of the financial interests involved.

The larger appropriation is necessary to supply both additional men and equipment, in order that early results may be obtained and made available for use in the large amount of Government construction work now being authorized by Congress.

The yearly loss by the Government from waste in material, time, and labor, due to the lack of reliable information concerning building materials, is greatly in excess of the cost of this work.

The yearly loss by the people from using an excess of material, from preventable fires, and from high insurance rates, due to poor materials and construction, amounts to many million dollars.

These industries, along with agriculture, are basal industries, upon which the future welfare of other industries and of the country depends.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of depositing public moneys: For expenses of depositing money received from the disposal of public lands, by registered mail, bank exchange, or otherwise, as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior, $2,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 67, after the word "Interior," at the end of line 2, insert "and under rules to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the completion of the ascertainment, survey, marking, and permanent establishment of that portion of the boundary line between the States of Idaho and Montana from the intersection of the thirty-fourth meridian of west longitude from Washington with the continental divide; thence northwestwardly following said continental divide and the crest of the Bitter Root Range of mountains to the intersection with the thirty-ninth meridian of west longitude from Washington, an estimated distance of 150 miles, including the expense of an examination of the survey in the field, the rate of compensation per mile to the surveyor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, the same to include the cost of the preparation of the plats and field notes of the survey in triplicate, to be immediately available, $15,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 73, at end of line 8, insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to resurvey township 22 south, range 16 east, Gila and Salt River meridian, and also township 1 north, range 2 west, same base and meridian, located in the Territory of Arizona."

Mr. TAWNEY. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, in order that the gentleman from Arizona may make some explanation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am glad to make it. There are two townships mentioned in the amendment that a resurvey of is required, because the locators of the homesteads can not perfect their entries on account of the survey being invalid. Now, the Committee on Public Lands, when this matter was before them, instructed me to make a report on the bill for the resurvey of both of these townships; and I have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he says, in effect, that while this ought to be done, the Secretary of the Interior had no power to do it except by authorization from Congress, and recommends that I offer an amendment to this bill. He says that they could do it, for they have got the money to make it; but they didn't have the power to do it unless authorized by Congress, and requested the authority of Congress to make the resurvey of these townships.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman's amendment carry any appropriation?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; only the authorization.

Mr. TAWNEY. He can do it out of the $400,000?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. He says he can do it if he has the authority. He has got money enough.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Government Hospital for the Insane: For current expenses of the Government Hospital for the Insane: For support, clothing, and treatment in the Government Hospital for the Insane of the insane from the Army and Navy, Marine Corps, Revenue-Cutter Service, inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, persons charged with or convicted of crimes against the United States who are insane, all persons who have become insane since their entry into the military and naval service of the United States who have been admitted to the hospital and who are indigent, including purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary horses and vehicles and of horses and vehicle for official use of the superintendent, $305,800; and not exceeding $1,500 of this sum may be expended in defraying the expense of the removal of patients to their friends; not exceeding $1,000 may be expended in the purchase of such books, periodicals, and papers as may be required for the purposes of the hospital, and not exceeding $1,500 for actual and necessary expenses incurred in the apprehension and return to the hospital of escaped patients.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, at the end of line 3, page 83, the words "Provided, That no salary or wages whatever shall be paid to any patient for any kind of labor or service."

Mr. TAWNEY. I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have the Chair rule. First, however, I would like to know what the ground of the gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. TAWNEY. On the ground that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the amendment merely makes what would be permanent law, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "superintendent," line 20, page 82, the following words: "Provided, That but one horse and vehicle or one automobile shall be kept for the use of the superintendent, and that used only on official business."

Mr. TAWNEY. I will reserve a point of order on that for the gentleman to make an explanation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order will lie as to this amendment, for the paragraph appropriates three hundred and some odd thousand dollars for certain purposes. These purposes are as follows:

For current expenses of the Government Hospital for the Insane: For support, clothing, and treatment in the Government Hospital for the Insane of the insane from the Army and Navy, Marine Corps, Revenue-Cutter Service, inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, persons charged with or convicted of crimes against the United States who are insane, all persons who have become insane since their entry into the military and naval service of the United States who have been admitted to the hospital and who are indigent, including purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary horses and vehicles and of horses and vehicles for official use of the superintendent, $305,800.

The purpose of this amendment is to limit the vehicles for the use of the superintendent of the hospital to one. I have been led to offer the amendment because the testimony before the special committee which has been appointed, and which is now sitting to investigate the affairs of the St. Elizabeth Asylum, shows that the present superintendent of that asylum has three carriages, two horses, and two automobiles for his personal use. I say that this is an outrage upon the taxpayers of this country. I say that the superintendent of that asylum has no use for two automobiles, three carriages, and two horses for his personal individual use.

Mr. RUCKER. Are they all at Government expense?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to inquire if the superintendent made any justification for the maintenance of these vehicles?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. None at all. The purchasing agent of the institution swore before that committee that the superintendent had three carriages, two horses, and two automobiles for his personal use. There are three automobiles now at the institution, and the money for the care of the institution ran so low that the inmates had to be deprived of turkey for a Thanksgiving dinner year before last for the first time in the history of the institution.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are these horses used by the superintendent for his own personal service, or are they used in connection with the service for the institution?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. These two horses are used, as the testimony shows, solely for his personal use.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman must be mistaken about that, in view of the testimony of the superintendent before the Committee on Appropriations, in which he says that he had one horse and carriage.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I have been following the testimony before the special committee very closely, and I heard the purchasing agent of that institution testify and swear positively that there were two horses, three carriages, and two automobiles for the personal use of the superintendent. They have about forty horses over there.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say anything further except this: I have been moved to offer that amendment in the interest of economy. I say that it is wrong; I say that it is unheard of; I say that it is an outrage upon the taxpayers of this country to provide this superintendent with these various means of locomotion. One vehicle and one horse or one automobile is certainly sufficient for all of the official travel that that gentleman has to do in this community, and I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the difficulty has been with the insane asylum that Congress has been too stingy instead of too liberal. I have an idea that if the superintendent of the hospital would maintain another automobile and get the visiting board and bring them over there to examine the hospital more often, it would not do any damage and it might be a help. We expect people to serve on the board and go out to the hospital and make an examination and they ought to be provided with some way of getting there and getting away from there, and they should not be required to wander over there one at a time by means of a street car line. I have no doubt that the conveyances they have there are used for such purposes as that, and properly used for such purposes. A few years ago, of course, the maintenance of an automobile was supposed to be only done by some multimillionaire, but now when clerks in Departments own them and clerks in some cases of the House of Representatives own them, and it goes without saying they are not extra well paid, it might be very proper and it is very proper, for St. Elizabeths to have some automobiles by which these people can be conveyed back and forth. The gentleman's statement that these are maintained solely for the superintendent I understand is incorrect. I do not know what testimony has been presented before his committee. It might be well to wait until the committee has made a report to the House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state to the gentleman that there are three automobiles over there.

Mr. MANN. It may be, I have no doubt of it. If there are three automobiles there, I have no doubt that there is necessity for three. I have had occasion several times to visit patients at St. Elizabeth's Asylum, and I have no doubt, from my observation over there, that these automobiles or whatever other conveyances they have are properly kept and kept for proper reasons. Let the gentleman's committee bring in its report based upon all the facts in the case, and if the report shows extravagance there, let us correct it, but I do not think we ought to start in to correct imaginary extravagances before the report is brought in.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if the committee to which he refers, and from which he suggests there should be a report brought into the House, was appointed for the purpose of investigating the question of an economic administration of the asylum? Was it not appointed for a more particular purpose, and is it not likely that such a report as will be made will not cover these points?

Mr. MANN. I assume, Mr. Chairman, that if the committee is hearing testimony upon a point it has authority to do so, and if it has authority to hear testimony it has authority to bring in a report. I do not know what the resolution of appointment was.

Mr. HAY. The committee has full authority to report on every question connected with the institution, and I would say that the gentleman is mistaken in his idea that the Board of Visitors use these automobiles. They do not use them at all.

Mr. MANN. Well, perhaps it would be better if they did.

Mr. HAY. That may be. I am not talking about that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think that an inspection as a result of an invitation by the superintendent, the inspector going in the superintendent's automobile, would be as effective as though the inspector went there unannounced?

Mr. MANN. I think that if the inspectors who are Government officials in a way go in a Government official vehicle, they are under no special obligation to the superintendent. These are not the automobiles of the superintendent; these are the automobiles of the Government. They are not under obligation to the superintendent if they have a right to them.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misapprehension about the Board of Visitors. The Board of Visitors of this institution in their evidence before the special committee took the position that they visited that institution at stated periods as provided by law; that there is no law which authorizes them to go there except at stated periods.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. When everybody is ready to receive them.

Mr. HAY. When everybody is ready to receive them.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And when it is known the exact moment at which they will arrive, and of course when everything is in readiness.

Mr. HAY. Yes; and Judge Maury, a member of the board, states that it is a farcical way of undertaking to inspect the institution, and I presume the special committee will probably bring in some recommendations about future inspections of the institution, but I do not think it is altogether a proper thing to go into a discussion of the management of this institution at this time until the investigation is concluded. It is not concluded now and will not be for some little time to come.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have had conversations with the gentleman from Virginia and other members of the committee which is now engaged in the investigation of this institution respecting certain changes that ought to be made, and when asked a few days ago by the gentleman from Virginia if we had included some suggestions which had been made, I stated to him the committee felt, in view of the fact, that this whole subject was being investigated, that we were not in a position in the first place where we could act intelligently, and we did not want to anticipate the work of the committee, and the gentleman from Virginia acquiesced by saying that he thought that would be the better policy.

Mr. HAY. That is what I have just stated.

Mr. TAWNEY. And I think that is also true of this particular item.

Mr. HAY. About this particular item there is the bare statement of fact that there are these carriages and automobiles and no reason was given why they were there.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Well, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HAY. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. You have not the floor on the point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I rise to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. It seems to be in the mind of the gentleman from Illinois that provision should be made in this direction for the transportation of the board of visitors, and I want to find out if an appropriation is not made in some other place, perhaps, to meet the expenses of the visits of the board of visitors.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no appropriation whatever.

Mr. HAY. There is no appropriation, because the statute provides these people shall serve without pay; they are honorary appointees, and there is no provision for expenses whatever.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Minnesota proceeds, the Chair would like the attention of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair understood the gentleman from Minnesota to withdraw the point of order. Did the gentleman from Illinois renew it?

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order. I would like to have the amendment again reported. I really do not know——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the language carried in this appropriation bill respecting horses and vehicles for the use of the superintendent of the hospital is the same language carried in previous appropriation bills with respect to this same subject. It reads:

> Including purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary horses and vehicles and of horses and vehicles for official use of the superintendent, $305,800.

When before the Committee on Appropriations, the superintendent was interrogated with respect to this particular item.

> Mr. TAYLOR. Before you get to that, let me ask him what he wants to do with these words on page 160 included in brackets. I suppose they go out because you have purchased your horses and vehicles. Do you want those words to go out, Doctor: "Including purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary horses and vehicles and of horses and vehicles for official use of the superintendent."

Now, the words there referred to are the words which are included in brackets in the form of the bill submitted to the committee, because in nearly all estimates from the Departments they are trying to get away from that limitation in respect to the use of horses and carriages. Many Members of the House will recall the controversy that arose here several years ago over this subject, which resulted in the insertion of that language with respect to all the appropriations for this service.

Strange as it may seem, in nearly every instance the estimates recommend the omission of this language, but the committee has not accepted the recommendation of the omission.

Doctor White, in answer to a question from Mr. Taylor, said:

> The superintendent always has had a horse and carriage, and still has in the bill. My recollection was that he was provided for on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, but perhaps I was wrong. Now, he has got to have a horse and carriage. I do not see how he can get along without a horse and carriage.
> The CHAIRMAN. He gets it now?
> Doctor WHITE. Yes; but on page 160 they contemplate the crossing out of that provision.
> The CHAIRMAN. I do not know why it is, but some clerk who made up the estimates omitted that language in all of them. You have this horse and carriage now?
> Doctor WHITE. Yes.
> Mr. TAYLOR. What has the superintendent in the way of vehicles and horses?
> Doctor WHITE. I have a horse and carriage and also an automobile, which I bought since I have been there, to replace one that was there when I got there. Then I have a small runabout that I use in inspecting the grounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen from the statement of Doctor White that he is using practically no more than is contemplated in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida. But gentlemen must bear in mind that that institution is at least 3½ miles from the Department of the Interior, which has general supervision over the institution, and under whose authority Doctor White acts, and to whom the Doctor must report; and it is necessary for the superintendent to come into the city in the ordinary transaction of the business of that institution, so that it is impossible for anybody to criticise the superintendent for having one or two horses and a carriage or two carriages and an automobile, and then the automobile that he is using in going around in those grounds, which is practically a city of 3,000 inhabitants. Take the language as it is in the law to-day, or in all the appropriation bills, respecting all the other Departments; they are all precisely the same thing.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand the statement of the chairman of the committee, this is the same language that has been carried for a number of years in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. Ever since the controversy arose over the abuse of the right of the use of horses and carriages by the Departments.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understood from remarks on the floor, the institution has about forty horses.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand it has about forty horses.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, the horses having already been purchased, having forty-odd horses on hand and two or three automobiles and a number of buggies and carriages, is it necessary to continue buying them every year?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; they do not.

Mr. MANN. If they have got to keep up forty horses, they have got to buy horses.

Mr. RUCKER. Forty horses?

Mr. MANN. You have to buy some every year if you keep forty horses.

Mr. RUCKER. He is a mighty poor manager if he has to buy forty horses every year.

Mr. MANN. Nobody can use forty horses without having to buy a number of them every year.

Mr. RUCKER. You might have to buy some, but would not have to buy forty. How much of this appropriation is needed to buy horses every year?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to explain to the gentleman how much has been used. A large number of the horses purchased are being used in teams and for draying.

Mr. RUCKER. I appreciate the fact that it is necessary to keep up the supply.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And it is necessary to have some to take the patients out for an airing, and other purposes.

Mr. RUCKER. There ought to be some ascertainment made as to the amount of money necessary to be expended to keep up the stable and not make the same appropriation each year, having already purchased the stock.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not a question of buying this stock each year, but of continuing authority to purchase if it is found that new horses are needed; then they are bought and paid for out of this general fund. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a few words in regard to this matter. In the beginning of this session of Congress, from information which came to me of a reliable and trustworthy character, I felt impelled to address the House on two occasions concerning the mismanagement of this governmental institution for the insane at St. Elizabeth's. Subsequently an investigation was ordered. That investigation has been dragging its slow length along for some time. I want to say, however, that from the testimony which has been thus far adduced everything which I said on the floor of this House in regard to the intolerable conditions existing at the St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum has been more than justified. My charges have been overwhelmingly sustained. My case has been proven.

Now, I do not want at this time to speak at length about the investigation, because it has not as yet been concluded; but I want to say to the members of the committee and to this House that I indulge the hope that the investigation will be concluded and the report of the committee made to us before this session of Congress adjourns, so that when Congress convenes again we will be able to legislate quickly and intelligently for a complete reformation of administration at that institution. I know it is imperative. The facts so far brought out by this investigation demonstrate it conclusively.

Now, just a word more, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. I do not think it is necessary for this superintendent to have three automobiles for his own use, any more than it is essential for a dog to have five legs. The people living in the District of Columbia have witnessed this superintendent, with his friends, time and again going around the city of Washington at all hours of the day and all hours of the night in these very fine automobiles. Instead of staying over at the insane institution and attending to his official duties—looking after the welfare of those poor insane persons—as he should do, he goes all around the town with his friends, having a most enjoyable time in Government automobiles.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SULZER. Why, of course I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are you aware of the fact that that automobile is used by the purchasing agent of the St. Elizabeth's Hospital, who is over here in the District of Columbia purchasing supplies and materials every day, and that it is not used exclusively by the superintendent?

Mr. SULZER. I doubt if anybody else uses it, especially if the superintendent knows it. Of course, he can not use three automobiles at the same time. There are three fine automobiles over there, and perhaps when he does not use the other two somebody else uses them; but what I wanted to call to the attention of the House is that he has three automobiles, and it is not necessary for him to have more than one, and that instead of using that all the time, going around and giving his friends a good time, he ought to be attending to his duties at the institution, attending to the matters he is paid to look after in connection with the care of these poor indigent insane people. It has been testified over and over again during the investigation that he does not visit the insane patients at the asylum more than once a month, and sometimes not more than once in two or three months. Some of these inmates have never seen him. Matters are in a bad shape at St. Elizabeth's. The investigation was ordered none too soon.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Assuming that the newspaper statements with reference to the developments at this institution are true, do you not think it would be advisable for the superintendent to spend more money for wholesome food and less for automobiles?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I agree with my friend. The point is well taken. The things which have been going on for years in this insane asylum are a disgrace to the Government. Let me say again that I do not care to discuss at this time the testimony which has already been adduced before the special committee of the House that has been investigating the sad and the intolerable conditions existing at the St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum, but I hope that the report will be made before this session of Congress adjourns, so that we shall have an opportunity to discuss the testimony in detail. But, sir, I want to repeat in closing that everything that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and myself charged on the floor of this House concerning the mismanagement of St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum before this investigation was begun has been more than proven, more than justified by the testimony which has been thus far adduced. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose and was recognized.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to any more discussion on the merits of the amendment until the point of order is determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's objection is proper, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] having spoken once upon the amendment, the Chair wishes to ask if the point of order is to be insisted upon?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order on the amendment, that it is clearly a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the amendment does not change existing law. It simply limits the use of property which it is proposed to buy, own, and control. Now, this paragraph, to which the amendment is offered, in addition to providing for other things, says that these funds are to be used for certain purposes, and among them this purpose:

Including purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary horses and vehicles, and of horses and vehicle for official use of the superintendent.

Now, I propose to amend that by prescribing the number of vehicles and horses that the superintendent shall have for his official use. How does that change existing law? How is it new law? It is entirely in keeping with the paragraph. It is of the same character as the paragraph, and it only limits the provision of law.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that gentlemen may talk as they please about the Board of Visitors and the uses to which these vehicles are put. The testimony in this case, uncontradicted, uncontroverted, and unquestioned, is that this man has three carriages, two horses, and two automobiles for his personal use. That is the testimony, and it is unquestioned by any witness. If this House intends to clothe this man, whom the testimony in this case will show to be the greatest autocrat in all this country——

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LAWRENCE). The Chair, in any event, is ready to rule. To the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raises the point of order that it is legislation on a general appropriation bill, and therefore contrary to the rules of the House. The amendment reads as follows:

Add after the word "superintendent," in line 20, page 22, the following words: "Provided, That but one horse and vehicle or one automobile shall be kept for the use of the superintendent, and that to be used only on official business."

The only way in which this amendment would be in order at this time would be on the ground that it is a limitation, and it seems to the Chair that the reading of the amendment clearly shows that it is not a limitation on this appropriation, but if enacted would make permanent law on the subject, and the Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For change of location on part of railroad switch to overcome the present difficulty with settling and sliding, $3,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, simply for the purpose of repeating a criticism that I have heretofore made as to the method in which appropriations are made for this institution.

As a matter of fact, Congress, under the present system, has no control whatever over the appropriations for St. Elizabeth's Hospital for the Insane. Appropriations for this institution are carried in two bills, $305,000 in this sundry civil bill and $279,000 in the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

When the District of Columbia appropriation bill was being made up, the subcommittee found that an estimate had been made that so much money would be required for the support of patients whose care is chargeable against the District of Columbia, and there was nothing for the committee to do but to appropriate the sum asked. An estimate is made for the support of the institution in certain respects, to be carried in this bill, and there is nothing for the committee to do but to grant the estimates asked by the authorities of the asylum.

The law authorizes the superintendent, subject to the approval of the board of visitors, to fix the number of employees and to fix their compensation. This is not usual in the public institutions of the Government of the United States. It is not usual in the appropriation bills in which appropriations are carried for the support of institutions to designate the number of employees of the different classes and the compensation to which those employees shall be entitled. I sincerely trust that one of the results of the investigation of the management of the insane hospital will be some recommendation, as a result of which Congress will resume control of the appropriations for the support and maintenance of that institution, and that hereafter, in some bill, the number of employees will be designated and their compensation settled by Congress, and that the institution will be provided for in the same manner that nearly all other institutions maintained by the Government are.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 267) to prohibit aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. R. 17881. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Crow Wing River between the counties of Morrison and Cass, State of Minnesota;

H. J. Res. 118. Joint resolution accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and including the same, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park, and changing the boundaries thereof; and

H. J. Res. 170. Joint resolution to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5684. An act for the relief of the Compañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico; and

S. 5365. An act to appoint Joseph Y. Porter a lieutenant-colonel and deputy surgeon-general, and to place him on the retired list of the Army.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

All moneys belonging to deceased inmates of the Government Hospital for the Insane and deposited in the Treasury by the superintendent as agent prior to February 20, 1905, shall, if unclaimed by the legal heirs of such inmate within the period of five years from the date of the passage of this act, be covered into the Treasury, and all moneys so deposited by the superintendent as agent after February 20, 1905, and belonging to inmates who have died since that time, or may hereafter die, shall likewise be covered into the Treasury unless claimed by his or her legal heirs within five years from the death of the inmate. And the superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to make diligent inquiry in every instance after the death of an inmate to ascertain the whereabouts of his or her legal heirs. Claims may be presented hereunder at any time, and when established by competent proof in any case more than five years after the death of an inmate shall be certified to Congress for consideration.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Suppose the heirs or relatives of the deceased person are minors. You make a hard and fast rule in reference to the time in which the legal representatives of the deceased person may recover. They can not get the money after the expiration of five years. That is all right with reference to people who are sui juris, but it looks to me like a hardship to the representatives or heirs of a deceased person if they are minors or infants at law to say that they shall be barred.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will observe the reading of the provision, he will see that they are not barred. They can at any time after five years, if they establish proof of the fact that they are heirs of the deceased, have an investigation by the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury will then certify the facts to Congress and Congress will appropriate the amount that has previously been turned into the Treasury. The object of this is to prevent two things. One is the accumulation in the Treasury of money that is not claimed by anybody, and therefore can not be used, and, secondly, as long as that money is there it is always a temptation to those in charge of the institution to try to induce Congress to let them use it for the benefit of the institution and to that extent increase their appropriations. Now, this provision protects everybody. They have five years in which to get the money, and then after the expiration of the five years if they prove that they are heirs of the deceased and entitled to the money the Secretary of the Treasury will certify that to Congress and Congress will appropriate the money.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Georgia did not read carefully the last sentence of the paragraph. The first part of it provides that within five years' time the heirs may apply while the money is held in the hands of the institution, and the latter sentence provides that claims may be presented hereunder at any time and, when established by competent proof, in any case more than five years after the death of the inmate, it shall be certified to Congress for their consideration, and that covers the whole ground. The first proposition, that within five years the heirs shall be, if found, allowed the money, and, secondly, if five years have elapsed, it shall go into the Treasury as a special fund, and during all the time the statute of limitation never runs against the heirs of the deceased.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman from Minnesota and also the gentleman from Ohio, I think the provision is a most commendable one, and I did not rise for the purpose of antagonizing it. But it occurred to me that in case the heirs of the deceased person were minors or infants in law, that they were not wholly protected. If the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Minnesota think they are protected under this provision, then I am content.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Georgia will look at the hearings on the subject, he will find that there is something over $40,000 lying in the Treasury of the United States that has been accumulating for a great many years. The committee thought that ought to be turned into the Treasury.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think so myself, but I want the heirs, if minors, protected.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no question about the heirs being protected, whether minors or not. Even if they are adults, they can obtain it after five years, under this provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rock Island Arsenal, Rock Island, Ill.: For general care, preservation, and improvements; for painting and care and preservation of permanent buildings; for building fences and sewers, grading grounds and roads, $25,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I notice an increase of $15,000 in the appropriation for Rock Island Arsenal. What was the cause of the increase?

Mr. TAWNEY. The increase is for the purpose of providing quarters for the hospital steward and also an additional separate quarters to be used for emergency hospital purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For new buildings?

Mr. TAWNEY. For new buildings; yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For quarters for hospital steward, with necessary accommodations for dispensary, emergency hospital treatment, and surgeons' office, $10,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here seems to be a new provision for quarters for hospital steward.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but this is the paragraph that I thought he was interrogating me about. The other increase to which he referred a moment ago has connection with the general repairs of the plant.

This item is for quarters for a hospital steward and an addition for an emergency hospital. They employ in the neighborhood of 5,000 men in that institution and there are frequently accidents happen to the men. They sustain injuries and they are some 3 miles from any one of the three towns right around Rock Island. Rock Island, as the gentleman knows, is an island in the Mississippi River. This is for the purpose of giving the steward quarters and providing sufficient accommodation for hospital purposes. The other item is for general repairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, under the head of general care, preservation, and improvement; for painting and care and preservation of permanent buildings, etc., there is an increase of $15,000. Then there is a new provision carrying $10,000 for quarters for hospital steward, necessary compensation for dispensary, etc. Then here is a provision for a stable, $9,000. That is new. Here is an increase of water supply for fire protection, enlargement of present pump house, extra machinery, $18,692—also new. That makes some $52,000 increase at the Rock Island Arsenal. I do not desire to make the point of order, because I think frequently in legislative halls, as elsewhere, men uniformed "rush in where angels dare not tread," but it does seem to me that that is an immense increase upon last year's appropriation of $10,000. There is an increase of $52,000 on a basis of $10,000. It seems to me that ought to be justified to the House, and I have called attention to all of it so that it might all be discussed at one time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the first item of $15,000 is made necessary by reason of transfer from the Army appropriation bill for the purchase of machinery to be used in the manufacture of small arms ammunition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is really not an increase at all?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not an increase. It is a transfer from the Army appropriation bill to this bill. This second is, as I have explained, for the building of quarters of the hospital steward and emergency hospital purposes. The third is for a stable. The old stable that was there was burned down last October or November—I do not now recall the month—and the increased water supply for fire protection is, as it states in the item, an enlargement of the present pump house, including extra machinery, $8,962. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that, in my judgment, that is a very small increase in this appropriation. The Government's investments there exceed $10,000,000, and the fire protection is absolutely inadequate.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. They have had a two-million dollar fire already.

Mr. TAWNEY. They have had a two-million dollar fire in consequence of not having adequate fire protection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no quarrel with that. I see that that is justified, but is not $9,000 rather expensive for a stable to be put there?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that is $11,000 less than the estimate, if my memory serves me right.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Nine thousand dollars less. They asked $18,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; $18,000 was the estimate, and we allowed them just 50 per cent of the estimate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How many horses are kept there?

Mr. TAWNEY. My recollection is twenty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The note here says the building now used as a stable is one of the old prison structures of the war, and that it is now in a condition almost beyond repair and is improperly located, and that a new brick structure upon a suitable site should be erected, etc. How many horses are to be accommodated there?

Mr. TAWNEY. About twenty. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINNEY] resides near there and is more familiar with the facts than I am, and I would ask the gentleman to make an explanation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course if it is very near the gentleman's home; the gentleman wants the stable; for my own experience in Congress is that whatever is expected in one's own "deestrict," as the darkies say in Mississippi, is always, in his opinion, something to be patriotically desired; but it seems to me that $9,000 is a pretty good price for a stable for twenty horses, unless you want to make it ornamental.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota or the gentleman from Illinois about this stable. Is it to complete the stable? It is not so much what we appropriate now, but hereafter, that concerns me. It is in the hereafter that I always see these big appropriations coming.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that it is expected to keep within the limit of that appropriation and to complete it. There is no question about the stable used heretofore having been burned down, and the horses have been kept recently in a temporary building.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman object to inserting the word "completion?"

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That would apply only to a structure in process of erection.

Mr. TAWNEY. The language, I will say, implies the completion of the building. They can not go beyond $9,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not?

Mr. TAWNEY. They have got to either build that or not any.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That has not been either my observation or experience.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, it has been your observation and your experience in respect to all items of this character when you are building——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know how many stables we have built in the last ten years, but I venture to say to the gentleman there has not been a public building ordered to be built in the last ten years that we have not had to add an extra appropriation to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, that statement is just as near the truth and being the fact——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman does not want to use that language to me.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say just as near the fact as a great many other statements the gentleman makes about things he does not know anything about.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman has cut off general debate in this House; he cut off everything he could, so we could not discuss these matters before taking them up, and now he quarrels because I am inquiring, as I have a right to, about the expenditure of public money.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Minnesota has not cut off the gentleman from Tennessee from talking.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman did cut off the gentleman from Tennessee by the rule made here, and against which Democrats voted. Now, I have the floor, and I propose to make this comment. I cite the gentleman to a case he does not know anything about, I dare say; and that is, we appropriated $8,000,000 to build the Annapolis improvements down there, and the Secretary came back and said he would not move a foot until we gave him $2,000,000 more, and we gave it. Now, there is one case, not a stable exactly; possibly in the estimation of the gentleman it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Rock Island Bridge, as follows: For operating and care and preservation of Rock Island bridge and viaduct, $12,500.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, while we are considering this sundry civil appropriation bill, which legislates out of the Treasury millions and millions of dollars annually of the people's money for all sorts of purposes and conditions of things—except the one I am going to talk about—I desire to call to the attention of the Members of this House a matter that I consider of much moment to all the people, and of far-reaching importance to the general welfare of the entire country—I refer to the construction of good roads as an aid to national progress.

Let me say that I have given this matter of national good highways careful study and considerable investigation, and I believe it is one of the most important questions now before the American people.

From time immemorable good road building has been one of the leading factors in advancing civilization, and it is a matter for general congratulation that the country is again earnestly urging the necessity, from an economic standpoint, of better roadways, and that we are all beginning to realize the industrial advantages that are sure to follow the construction of better transportation facilities throughout the land.

The appeal for good roads is a patriotic demand that comes to us from every section of the land—from our most intelligent and far-sighted and disinterested citizens—and I assert that the time is at hand when the Congress of the United States must take up the matter seriously and legislate intelligently on the subject. The question will not down, and it can not much longer be ignored. The people want it, and what the people want they generally get. As President Roosevelt recently said:

Merely from the standpoint of historical analogy we should have a right to ask that this people which has tamed a continent, which has built up a country with a continent for its base, which boasts itself with truth as the mightiest Republic that the world has ever seen, which we firmly believe will in the century now opening rise to a position of headship and leadership such as no other nation has ever yet attained—merely from historical analogy, I say, we should have a right to demand that such a nation build good roads. Much more have we a right to demand it from the practical standpoint. The difference between the semibarbarism of the middle ages and the civilization which succeeded it was the difference between poor and good means of communication. And we, to whom space is less of an obstacle than ever before in the history of any nation; we who have spanned a continent, who have thrust our border westward in the course of a century and a quarter until it has gone from the Atlantic over the Alleghenies, down into the valley of the Mississippi, across the Great Plains, over the Rockies to where the Golden Gate lets through the long-heaving waters of the Pacific; we, who take so little account of mere space, must see to it that the best means of nullifying the existence of space are at our command.

I agree with the President in what he has said concerning this matter, and I hope ere long he will send to the Congress a special message urging us to take some immediate and definite action regarding Government aid to good road building throughout the United States. The fathers of the Republic wisely recognized the importance of this question. Washington and Jefferson advocated good roads and projected the construction of the great highway from the capital to the Mississippi Valley. The far-seeing statesmen of the early days of our national existence championed and passed measures to better the means of transportation. They knew that of all human agencies the one which has done most for humanity and civilization has been the building of good roads—the abridgment of distance in the facility of communication.. They realized the necessity of good roads—how important they were to the country—to its growth and its development, and to mankind, morally, physically, intellectually, and industrially, removing national and provincial antipathies and binding together all the branches of the great human family.

Mr. Chairman, we appropriate a great deal of money every year for the Army. That is necessary. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have always been liberal to the boys in blue—to the brave and heroic soldiers of our country. We appropriate upward of $100,000,000 every year for the Navy; and I am, and always have been, a friend of our gallant and glorious Navy, which has illumined with its immortal achievements every page of American history. We spend millions annually for pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Union, and that is entirely just and proper, and in accordance with the solemn promise of the country. We vote a great deal of money every year for public buildings and grounds, and a stately Federal structure adorns almost every city in the land. We appropriate millions and millions of dollars for fortifications and coast defenses—no doubt necessary. The Government has spent thus far over $500,000,000 for river and harbor improvements, and at times, since I have been a Member of this House, I have felt impelled to oppose some of these appropriations because I believed in certain instances they were unnecessary and extravagant. But in more than fifty years we have not appropriated a dollar for good roads for our common highways. The record will demonstrate, I think, that there is appropriated annually a great deal of money from the pockets of the taxpayers for purposes that bring very little material return or lasting benefit to the rank and file of the people of the country.

I call attention to these vast annual expenditures of money by way of contrast—and we are a country of great contrasts—to show how important to the men and women of the land to-day is the proposition for the building of good roads for their own use and benefit, and for the progress and the prosperity of our expanding Republic—the greatest the sun of noon has ever smiled upon in all the annals of the past. [Applause.]

Now, sir, I declare that the history of civilization demonstrates that the rise of great governments and the growth of powerful dynasties were coincident with the construction of good roads and the resulting facility of communication and transportation. The Romans were the greatest road builders the world has ever seen, and the highways they built in the palmy days of their greatness constitute the most lasting monument to their constructive genius; and the marvelous thing about it all is that these roads are practically just as good to-day as they were when they were built. The far-sighted wisdom of Julius Cæsar built from the imperial exchequer the magnificent roads that led from all directions to eternal Rome. The great Napoleon—Cæsar like—built the roads of France that center in Paris from the general funds of the Government, and these French roads have done more than any other single agency to encourage the thrift and increase the industry and insure the contentment of the people of France. Cæsar and Napoleon were the great road builders of the modern world, and their foresight and their judgment demonstrated the beneficent results that follow, as the night the day, the construction of governmental highways.

England's good roads are to-day famous. They were not always so. Let me read to you what a celebrated English author said about Britain's bad roads less than a century ago. Macaulay, writing of the condition of the public roads of England previous to 1835, says:

> The fruits of the earth were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while a few miles distant the supplies fell short of the demand. One chief cause of the badness of the roads was the defective state of the law. Every parish was bound to repair the roads which passed through it, and thus a sparse and impoverished population was often compelled to maintain highways between rich and populous towns.

Then came Telford and Macadam—the great road builders of Britain. They pointed out the cause of stagnation and decay; they fought and agitated for good roads by parliamentary appropriations; they predicted the beneficent results sure to follow the construction of better highways; and through their foresight and endeavors England has to-day good roads from one end of her domain to the other—as good as any thoroughfares in all the world.

The United States must build and possess good roads. The General Government must lend its aid to their construction. They must be free to all the people and stretching away in all directions throughout the length and the breadth of the land. It is essential to our development. We are the greatest and the grandest and the richest Republic in all the ages, and only on the threshold of our glorious destiny; but yet, I am sorry to say, we are far behind the other great governments of the world in the construction and maintenance of good roads. Every person who has traveled abroad is at once impressed with this unfortunate fact. It is a reflection on our energy, a sad commentary on our sagacity, and a humiliating comparison with our progressive enterprise in every other field of endeavor. We must not lag behind the European states in this important matter; and yet, if we start now, it will take us years and years to equal the good roads of continental governments and distant oriental countries.

Good roads, sir, are the arteries of the industrial life of a great and powerful people. In a Government such as ours, all sorts and conditions of men and women are more or less absolutely dependent upon the best and speediest means of communication and transportation. If you say good roads will only help the farmers, I deny it. The farmers, who produce the necessaries of life, are less dependent than the millions and millions of people who live in our cities and towns. The most superficial investigation of this subject will clearly prove that good roads are just as important to the consumers, if not more so, than they are to the producers of the country.

Now, it may be claimed by some unthinking individual that the railroads answer all requirements, or at least have decreased the need of good roads. Let us see. Last year it cost about $1,850,000,000 to transport the products of the country over dirt roads to the nearest shipping point, while the railroads received, all told, in gross receipts, from every source for the same period of time, considerably less; so that it will readily be perceived that the railroad systems fall far short of supplying the transportation needs of the people; and besides the difference in the cost of transporting freight over good roads and bad roads is enormous as it is startling. The statistics show it costs about 25 cents a ton a mile, on an average, to transport merchandise over the dirt roads of the United States, and that the average cost over the improved roads of twenty European states is less than 10 cents a ton a mile. Here is a difference of over a billion dollars a year between the cost of transportation over good roads and bad roads, and every dollar of it to-day comes out of the pockets of the toilers and producers of America and is a dead financial loss. The difference in cost of transportation by steam, horsepower, and electricity over the highways of the United States is illustrated by the following table, based on the most careful estimates, which shows how far $1.25 will go to pay for transporting a ton of freight in four different ways:

Cost of transportation per ton.

Horsepower, 5 miles	$1.25
Electric power, 25 miles	1.25
Steam cars, 250 miles	1.25
Steamships on the Lakes, 1,000 miles	1.25

Now, sir, in this connection I want to read a brief extract from an eloquent speech delivered last year by Hon. William J. Bryan before the annual convention of the National Good Roads Association. Mr. Bryan said:

> I have become exceedingly interested in this subject. * * * The expenditure of money for the permanent improvement of the common roads can be defended, first, as a matter of justice to the people who live in the country; second, as a matter of advantage to the people who do not live in the country; and, third, on the ground that the welfare of the nation demands that the comforts of country life shall, as far as possible, keep pace with the comforts of city life.
> It is a well-known fact, or a fact easily ascertained, that the people in the country, while paying their full share of the Federal taxes, receive, as a rule, only the general benefits of government; while the people in the cities have, in addition to the protection of the Government, the advantages arising from the expenditure of public moneys in their midst. The farmer not only pays his share of the taxes, but more than his share; yet very little of what he pays gets back to him. * * * The farmer has nothing that escapes taxation. The improvement of the country roads can be justified also on the ground that the farmer, the first and most important producer of wealth, ought to be in position to hold his crop and market it at the most favorable opportunity, whereas at present he is virtually under compulsion to sell it as soon as it is matured, because the roads may become impassable at any time during the fall, winter, or spring. The farmer has a right to insist upon roads that will enable him to go to town, church, schoolhouse, and to the homes of his neighbors, as occasion may require; and with the extension of the rural delivery he has an additional need for good roads in order that he may be kept in communication with the outside world.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with what Mr. Bryan has so well said. The farmer gets very little benefit from the General Government and is taxed on everything. The burdens of life fall hardest on the farmer. The least the Government can do for him is to help him get decent highways. I am with the farmers in this fight for good roads. I am with the rural districts of our land in their struggle for better transportation facilities, and in Congress or out of Congress I shall do all in my power to hasten the consummation they desire—the ability to go and come along decent roads without exhausting the time and the effort and the utility of man and beast. I know farm life. My boyhood days were spent on a farm doing farm work. I know the farmer's joys and sorrows—his trials and his troubles and his triumphs. We owe much to the farmers and producers of our country—much that we can never repay. Whatever will aid them will benefit the people in every community.

To-day I represent in Congress a great district in the very heart of the city of New York—a great, patriotic people, of whom I am justly proud—but I am broad-minded enough and farseeing enough to realize that what will help one part of our country will benefit every other section of our land, and I deprecate the narrow view that is often expressed concerning the local character of this important question of good-road building. It is not local or sectional. It is national in all its aspects; it is for the public weal; it will promote the general welfare, and the Government should give its legislative sanction to the project and render all the aid within its power. I say it is the duty of the Federal Government to lend our rural population a helping hand to remove the curse of bad roads. [Applause.]

I am glad to note that there is revival of interest all along the line in the making of good roads. The Government at the present time is committed to the policy of highway improvements and the construction of good roads in Porto Rico, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in the Philippines. We are spending millions and millions of dollars every year for the building of good roads in our insular possessions, but not one dollar for the same purpose in our own continental country. Let us keep up the fight for good roads at home, ever bearing in mind that no country now enjoys good roads without governmental aid in their construction.

Good road building is a public matter, a national necessity, and it closely concerns the general welfare of the whole country. I am in favor of Government aid in the construction of good roads for all the people. [Applause.] These roads will be postal highways for the delivery of the mails, military channels in case of war, the great arteries of interstate commercial life, and the avenues through which the chariot of progress shall drive ever and anon, bringing the products of plenty to the rich and the poor alike and untold benefits to all the land for ages yet to come.

Speaking on the subject of good roads and national greatness, Gen. Nelson A. Miles said recently:

I know of no one element of civilization in our country that has been more neglected than the improvement of our roads, yet this is the element that marks the line between barbarism and civilization in any country. The founders of our Government strongly advocated the necessity of opening up and improving the means of internal communication. The immortal Washington retired from the pomp and circumstance of glorious war to occupy the honorable position of a sovereign citizen, and while conducting the affairs of his plantation was president of a transportation company. The author of the Declaration of Independence, the founder of one of our great universities and the eminent statesman who gave to us this vast empire west of the Mississippi, was right when he said in a letter addressed to Humboldt:

"It is more remunerative, splendid, and noble for the people to spend money on canals and roads that will build and promote social intercourse and commercial facilities than to expend it on armies and navies." He was right again when he said, in a letter to James Ross: "I experience great satisfaction in seeing my country proceed to facilitate intercommunication of several parts by opening rivers, canals, and roads. How much more rational is this disposition of public money than that of waging war."

How true are the words of immortal Jefferson regarding the disposition of public money. We appropriate millions and millions of dollars every year for war—not a dollar for peace. We spend millions and millions of dollars annually for the improvement of our rivers, and not a dollar for the improvement of our roads. We have negected this important work too long. It is all to our shame. Let us begin; let us follow in the footsteps of the builders of the Republic, and commence now to do something to improve our national roadways. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the House to a bill I introduced in Congress to promote the building of good Government roads. It is H. R. 19470, introduced by me on May 18, 1906, and entitled "A bill to promote good roads and the efficiency of the postal service in the States and Territories of the United States." It is a very short bill, and I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read in my time, so that it will go in the RECORD and be a part of my speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to promote the construction of good roads and the efficiency of the postal service in the States and Territories of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the application of the proper authorities representing any State or Territory of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall loan to such State or Territory for the construction or improvement of post-roads within such State or Territory and outside the limits of any city or incorporated village the actual cost of such construction or improvement: Provided, That the construction or improvement of said post-roads shall be under the general supervision of the Post-Office Department and according to specifications approved by it, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to make all needful rules and regulations relating thereto: Provided further, That one twenty-fifth part of all money received from the United States Government under the provisions of this act shall be each year returned to the Treasury of the United States by the State or Territory receiving the same until the whole amount received by such State or Territory shall have been returned.

SEC. 2. That no interest shall be charged upon money loaned under the provisions of this act when return to the Treasury is promptly made as provided for by this act, but a 5 per cent per annum interest charge shall be added to all deferred payments. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make all necessary arrangements with the States and Territories with respect to the said loan.

SEC. 3. That the President is directed to cause to be laid before Congress, as soon as convenience will permit after the commencement of each session, a statement of all proceedings under this act.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that bill speaks for itself. It is a short bill, a concise bill, and to my mind it embodies a most comprehensive plan for the building of good roads throughout the country by Government aid, and yet ultimately it will not take one dollar from the Treasury of the United States. This bill of mine provides a simple way and an expedient plan to accomplish immediate better governmental highway construction. In a nutshell, the bill authorizes the General Government to loan its surplus money without interest to the States and Territories to build good roads, the work to be done under the general supervision of the Post-Office Department and in accordance with its rules and regulations, and the money thus loaned to be repaid to the Government in small annual installments. The bill is not subject to constitutional objection, for the reason that under its provisions the States and Territories borrow the money, furnish the right of way, and are required to protect and maintain the roads after they are built. None of the powers of the States are interfered with in any way. It is Government cooperation, and the right of the Government to loan its surplus money to aid in the construction of good roads for all the people has been held over and over again to be constitutional. This plan of mine is as simple as it is feasible.

My bill may not be perfect—I am willing to change it if anyone can suggest an amendment to make it better—but I believe it is far-reaching in its possibilities for immediate and economical good-road building. Its object is plain. It will build the roads, give us better postal facilities, cheapen transportation, keep money in circulation, give employment to the idle workmen of the country, initiate the undertaking demanded by the people, restore to life every languishing local industry, market the products of our producers, aid our commerce, increase our wealth, extend our prosperity, solve the problem, and give our country the best highways in all the world in less than twenty-five years, without in the end actually costing the Federal Government a single dollar.

Mr. Chairman, let me assure all my colleagues that I have no vanity in this matter. I am seeking results—the speedy accomplishment of the thing desired. I want to say that I am wedded to no particular plan for governmental improvement of our national highways, although I think my bill is by far the simplest, the most practicable, and the most comprehensive proposition which has thus far been presented to bring about Congressional action for the building of good roads; and I submit the measure to the candid consideration of the people of the country, who are thinking about and investigating this subject, in order that they may study it and approve it if they think it is an honest and a just way to aid in the establishment of good avenues of transportation from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf; and I submit it to the Members of Congress, hoping that they will study its practicability and take some action on the bill in the very near future. I have no ambition in this matter save to serve the people and comply with their wishes. As I said, I am simply seeking to accomplish results. I am in favor of good roads. I know it is an impossibility for the counties or the States of the Union to build good roads without some help from the National Government. My plan is to have the Government aid the States and Territories by loaning them, in the first instance, the money to build these good roads and let the States pay back the money in small annual installments. In this way we will soon have good roads without finally depleting the National Treasury a single dollar, because every dollar which will be spent from the National Treasury will come back again. I know there are other bills pending in Congress in regard to this matter, and I know that there have been bills pending in Congress for years and years seeking to do something for the construction of good roads, but thus far not one of these bills has ever been favorably acted upon.

In my opinion, there can be no serious objection to the provisions of my bill, and I believe if it should become a law the whole problem would be solved, and in less than a quarter of a century we would have the grandest highways that exist in all the world, and it would do more than any other single agency I can think of to develop our resources, benefit all our people, and make us greater and grander and more prosperous in a commercial and industrial way. [Applause.]

Sir, the people of the country know the importance of good road building. They are familiar with the truths of history. They know the past. They realize that often the difference between good roads and bad roads is the difference between profit and loss. Good roads have a money value far beyond our ordinary conception. Bad roads constitute our greatest drawback to internal development and material progress. Good roads mean prosperous farmers; bad roads mean abandoned farms, sparsely settled country districts, and congested, populated cities, where the poor are destined to become poorer. Good roads mean more cultivated farms and cheaper food products for the toilers in the towns; bad roads mean poor transportation, lack of communication, high prices for the necessaries of life, the loss of untold millions, and idle workmen seeking employment. Good roads will help those who cultivate the soil and feed the multitude, and whatever aids the producers of our country will increase our wealth and our greatness and benefit all the people of the land. We can not destroy our farms without general decay and final deterioration. They are to-day the heart of our national life and the chief source of our material greatness. Tear down every edifice in our towns and labor will rebuild them, but abandon the farms and our cities will crumble away and disappear forever.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I appeal to you in the name of patriotism, for our common weal, for our commercial supremacy, in the name of 20,000,000 of our fellow-citizens, to do something, and do it quickly, for good roads; lend the States the money; begin the construction; put the unemployed to work, and a grateful and responsive people will rise up and call you blessed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in conclusion, that I take an abiding interest in this all-absorbing question for better highways throughout the land by some plan of governmental assistance. I am for the cause, and in the fight to stay. I am now, always have been, and always will be, a friend of good road building. It means progress and prosperity, a benefit to the people who live in the cities, and an advantage to the people who live in the country, and it will help every section of our vast domain. Good roads, like good streets, make habitation along them most desirable; they enhance the value of farm lands, facilitate transportation, and add untold wealth to the producers and consumers of the country; they are the milestones marking the march of civilization; they economize time and labor and money; they save wear and tear and worry and waste; they beautify the country, bring it in touch with the city, and aid the social and religious and educational and industrial advancement of the people; they make better homes and happier hearthsides; they are the avenues of trade, the highways of commerce, the mail routes of information, and the agencies of speedy communication; they mean the economical transportation of marketable products—the maximum burden at the minimum cost; they are the ligaments that bind the country together in thrift and industry and intelligence and patriotism; they promote social intercourse, prevent intellectual stagnation, and increase the happiness and the prosperity of our producing masses; they contribute to the glory of the country, give employment to our idle workmen, distribute the necessaries of life—the products of the fields and the forests and the factories—encourage energy and husbandry, inculcate love for our scenic grandeur, and make mankind better and greater and grander. Good roads have made the glory of the nations of the past, and good roads will add to our greater glory and make us all that we hope to be, the most beneficent power that ever blessed an advancing and progressive humanity. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement, care, and maintenance of reservation No. 17, and site of old canal northwest of same, $2,500: Provided, That no part thereof shall be expended upon other than property belonging to the United States.

Mr. RUCKER. I move to strike out the last word. A few days ago, when I was somewhat embarrassed by my peculiar environment, I listened to some discussion from the floor, and I remember that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] announced seriously and solemnly on that occasion that it was the sworn duty, as I recollect his language, of a Member to remain in his seat from the time the House convened until it adjourned each day.

Now, I have no desire to cause the gentleman any inconvenience, but if this Chair had the power to issue warrants I believe I would make the point of no quorum in order that the gentleman from New York might be arrested and brought into this committee. But as I do not care to obstruct and as I am very anxious to proceed with this business, I merely call attention to the fact that the gentleman is derelict in his duty to-day. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For constructing a macadam roadway along the north and west sides of the tidal reservoir in Potomac Park from the terminus of the Seventeenth street roadway opposite the bathing beach to the Potomac River entrance to the reservoir, and for improving the grounds on either side of the said roadway in accordance with plans prepared in the office of public buildings and grounds, to be expended under the direction of the officer in charge of that office, $60,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I notice a new item here of $60,000 for the construction of a macadam roadway along the north and west sides of the tidal reservoir in Potomac Park. Is that where they are contemplating having that new park?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not strictly a new item. At the last session of Congress there was about the same amount given—$50,000, if I recollect correctly—for the driveway, which extends along the southeast portion of the tidal basin, and other improvement there, and this will be along the southwest of the tidal basin, corresponding therewith.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long is that road to be? If it is not for a road—this includes the road, does it not?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. About 4,000 feet.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About 4,000 feet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The provision reads:

For construction of a macadam roadway along the north and west sides of the tidal reservoir, in Potomac Park, from the terminus of the Seventeenth street roadway opposite the bathing beach to the Potomac River entrance to the reservoir, and for improving the grounds on either side of the said roadway.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is very different from building a road.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, is that a matter of improving the new park here, as I asked a moment ago?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The part to the southeast of the tidal basin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It says:

On either side of the said roadway.

Does this include the whole park?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; and it includes piping water there and improving the grounds to the southwest of the tidal basin; in a general way similar to that to the southeast of the tidal basin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right. I suppose you have looked into it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It includes the improvement of 50 feet on each side of the roadway.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long is the roadway?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. About 4,000 feet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Sixty thousand dollars for a roadway 4,000 feet long and the improvement of 50 feet on each side of it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If my colleague [Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts] will pardon me, $10,000 of this is for the putting in of water pipes. This road is to be constructed, and the ground on each side of the road is to be put into sod or grass in some way, similar to what has been done on the other side of the tidal basin, and it is an estimate of practically the same amount of money that was expended last year upon the part southeast of the tidal basin, aside from the expense of putting in these water pipes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, how much do they expect to pay for that macadam road?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, the macadam road will not cost much.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Macadam road ought not to cost over $2,500 a mile.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no; more than that, certainly; but this road is to be graded, as the ground is not in suitable condition on which to lay the road. In addition to that, it appears here from a communication which, I think, is not in the printed hearings, having arrived after the regular hearings, that it will be necessary to repair or replace a portion of the wall which holds the earth back from the tidal basin, what would ordinarily be called a sea wall. It includes the carrying onto this ground of soil on which something will grow.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where are they going to get that kind of soil around here?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not imagine. I presume they will have to bring it a great distance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They will have to go to Iowa or Missouri to get it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not imagine where they could get anything of that kind near Washington.

Mr. TAWNEY. They can not get anything so good near Washington.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This ground has been made by digging up sand from the bottom of the Potomac, and nothing will grow there until they cover it with fertile soil.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Four thousand feet is only about four-fifths of a mile. I know a good deal about macadam roads, because a hundred miles of the finest road in the world is in my country. You can get good macadam roads made for $2,000 a mile.

Mr. CAPRON. How wide?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would say 16 or 18 feet wide.

Mr. CAPRON. This is to be a hundred feet wide.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You can not get any such road as that built down there for $2,000 or $4,000 a mile.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You can build as good a macadam road as there is in the United States for $2,000 a mile, wide enough for two wagons to pass each other easily. Of course, they will make it wider here; but I know something about macadam roads, because a hundred miles of the finest road in the world is in my own county. My recollection is that the last road that was built in that county, where they had to make the roadbed, was built for $1,800 a mile. Now, if they are going to make an asphalt street, or something of that kind, I do not know anything about that; but to save my soul I do not see how they could reasonably spend $6,000 on that piece of ground.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have explained to the gentleman from Missouri that it is not to be spent upon the road; that only a portion of it is to be spent on the road. It includes building waterworks, or putting in water pipes down there. It also includes putting in earth, and the gentleman has said that they will have to go a long way to get good earth.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much does it cost to put in 4,000 feet of water pipe?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, it is not a question of 4,000 feet of water pipe; it is a question of extending the water main from this city over to that territory beyond the tidal basin.

Mr. RUCKER. What is it good for after it is improved?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is a part of a beautiful park system that is now highly developed over a portion of it.

Mr. PRINCE. A driveway.

Mr. RUCKER. Where is it?

Mr. PRINCE. Over south of the White House and Monument.

Mr. RUCKER. I am asking for information. We Democrats, who have to stay here and work all the while, can not go out and take in the suburbs. I notice now, notwithstanding the great membership of this House, at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. there are only about thirty of the "faithful" present to consider important matters before the House. Probably the others are looking at these beautiful parks. I do not know; but we Democrats must stay here, because if we do not the Sergeant-at-Arms will go after us. I sincerely hope, however, that the Sergeant-at-Arms will not be directed to arrest and bring to the bar of the House the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who is not now in his seat.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What time were you arrested the other day by the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, about 6 o'clock—after supper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For new steam roller, $3,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry. Can the gentleman tell us how much we are appropriating in this bill for machinery for public improvements? I should like to have that information.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It would be impossible for me to tell the gentleman how much is appropriated in various items for machinery.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought, as the gentleman seems to have mastered this bill so well, that, possibly, he might be able to tell us. I should like to know. This bill carries about $94,000,000 and provides for millions to be spent in buying machinery. Mr. Chairman, of course we have a right to know, and the public has the right to know.

I had the pleasure a few evenings ago, in whiling away some of the hot evenings that we have experienced, to examine the volumes of testimony taken by the Industrial Commission, to find in Volume XIV, pages 528 and 533, a most intelligent statement on the prices of machinery, made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], treasurer of the Merrimac Mills, He said "protection" had so protected the machine builders that "they have a scheme whereby there is but one price for anything in this country." He said he wanted the tariff revised, so he could import machinery. "I am an exporter. I want the world." He exported to South America, China, Africa, and competed with England and other countries, he stated. His mills paid a semiannual dividend of 3 per cent. His concerns—several mills—were capitalized between six and seven millions. I regret that I have not the statement here, but I ask unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD. It is short.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., February 20, 1901.

Testimony of Mr. Charles L. Lovering, treasurer of the Merrimac Mills.

The subcommission being in session in the rooms of the Home Market Club, Mr. Clarke presiding, at 3 o'clock p. m. Mr. Charles L. Lovering, of Boston, treasurer of the Merrimac and other mills, was introduced as a witness, and, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Q. (By Mr. Clarke.) Please give your name and post-office address.—A. Charles L. Lovering; Taunton is my voting place and Boston my living place; post-office box 2344, Boston.

Q. Please state your official relation to manufacturing companies.—A. I am treasurer of several corporations.

Q. Name them or some of them.—A. Yes; of the Massachusetts Cotton Mills, of Lowell; the Merrimac Manufacturing Company, of Lowell; the Massachusetts, in Georgetown, Ga.; the Merrimac Manufacturing Company, at Huntsville, Ala. The Alabama concern is not a separate corporation; it is a part of the northern mills; it is a property I am not particularly familiar with.

Q. Any other mill in Massachusetts except at Lowell?—A. I am treasurer of the Whittington Manufacturing Company, at Taunton, but it so happens that my brother does most of the work. He is the assistant treasurer and does whatever has to be done there except when we want a little money or cotton.

Q. Are all these mills engaged in manufacturing cotton goods?—A. Entirely.

A VICTIM OF PROTECTION WANTED TARIFF REVISION.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The distinguished, intelligent, and very frank witness under oath, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] on tariff revision, said:

Q. (By Mr. CLARKE.) Would you like to have the tariff revised or let alone?—A. I would like to have it revised. I am an exporter. I want the world.

Q. How would you like to have it changed?—A. That I am not able to tell you. I can not go into that discussion, but I know there are places where we are a little bit handicapped. For instance, if I want to make a repair up here at the mill at Lowell or in the South I am handicapped with the high cost of machinery—two and a half times as much as the English price. The English can build a mill and capitalize it at a third of what we can here. That means something in the cost of goods in the long run.

Q. You would like to be able to get cheaper machinery?—A. I would like the machinery somewhat reduced. The machinery builders of this country are so well protected that under the protection they have a scheme whereby there is but one price for anything in this country.

Q. Does this fact apply to machinery on which they have patents, or otherwise?—A. I do not refer to the patent part of it. The time was, a few years ago, when you could get two or three prices on machinery. They said they did not make money that way. I am not going to dispute that, but when you get the price of goods way down below, we can not get the machinery down to help us out any.

Q. You think the high price of machinery, then, is largely on account of the duties on it?—A. I think the manufacturers are enabled under the duties to combine. For instance, several years ago I was interested in a large cotton-yarn concern; and at that time we could bring all our cards from England at a low price because we could bring them here and pay the duties and save quite a little amount and get as good a card. A ring spinning frame is better built in this country than abroad. A large proportion of the machinery all through the carding room is equally good abroad, and could be got at a less figure at that time. But I am not a complainer in any sense. I do not think we can go on in this country making cotton goods at the rate we are now making them without an outside market and a much larger one than we have to-day.

Q. Do you think there is anything in the way of getting that market except the high cost of machinery?—A. I do not know that I would say that there is not. There are some countries I imagine we can not get into. I have not much knowledge about it. There are countries we can not put our goods into.

Q. Then any change in our tariff would not affect that?—A. It might. We might be able to get into other countries.

Q. (By Mr. LITCHMAN.) Have not they got the advantage of the importation of machinery without the payment of duty?—A. Oh, yes; Germany has.

Q. How could you possibly get into those countries?—A. We do not expect to put any cloth into Germany or England.

Q. How could you get into the ccuntries that Germany supplies, except by a reduction in the price of labor?—A. I tell you now I honestly think that notwithstanding the high cost of labor per yard in this country a great many goods are made at as low a price as they are made in Germany with low-price labor.

Q. On account of superior skill and production?—A. Yes; better climate, etc. But I am not much of a talker on the tariff, except that I want all the outside markets we can get; and I am free to say we can not go on and make goods as we are now doing without such market.

Q. (By Mr. CLARKE.) Does the prospect of revising the tariff have any effect on business generally?—A. It does, but it is a thing which the poeple will get over after a while. Sometimes you have to have a herculean operation to cure a man—cut off his leg or something.

Q. The business depression, then, incident to a revision would not deter you from advising a revision?—A. No; it does not. I should not be intelligent enough to make the revision; I do not know enough about it, but I think that to live and let live the world over is rather the best way to get along.

Q. You think the cotton-goods schedule can stand any reduction?—A. Almost everything I make can get along without any tariff, because we can beat England now in many markets. The English can not make a drill of the same capacity, of the same standard as we make, and compete with us in China. They make an inferior drill and therefore get there.

Q. If you had no duties would there be any danger of the dumping of the surplus stocks in this country so as to demoralize the market?—A. I do not think so. But everybody must be treated with the same consideration, in my opinion. I do not think you can discriminate in my favor against somebody else making finer yarn.

Q. Notwithstanding the practical difficulty of revising the tariff you would still recommend it?—A. I would recommend a lower tariff. It occurs to me if there was a lower rate of duty properly applied to all productions it might be better for the country. We go to work and make goods at a high cost, and then raise the labor; and everything that labor has to buy it has to pay more for, so that it is not much better off. I think, however, labor is as well paid to-day as I have known it to be in this country.

Q. Are the goods you sell more expensive than a while ago?—A. A good deal. It is not two years since that our goods have increased in cost at Lowell 20 per cent. The increase is 25 per cent since 1888.

Q. What is that increase in cost due to?—A. To two 10 per cent advances in labor, which makes 20 per cent; and in the supplies that go into it.

Q. If the tariff was reduced, would not labor have to be content with a less wage?—A. Yes; but it could buy what it gets for less. The point is, the lower you can offer a commodity to the world the bigger business you can do. You can do twice as much business with China with a drill at 5 cents as at 7 cents. The same is true in South America; it is also true in Africa. Those are the great consuming countries of the coarse products made North and South in this country.

Q. Before this present war in China, were the Chinese manufacturing cotton goods to some extent?—A. Yes; to some extent. I do not know to how great an extent, but their goods never interfered with well-made and well-constructed American goods. They did not take the same place. They went to parts of China where they were willing to wear an inferior article.

Q. Do you know of any reason why they can not produce as good goods there as you can here?—A. I do not think they can. The morale of the country or of the labor there is not at all commensurate or to be compared with ours. The very idea that a man can live on a cent's or two-thirds of a cent's worth of rice does not to my mind permit him to compete with the man that lives on a piece of beef.

Q. Are you familiar with cotton goods made in India?—A. I have seen them.

Q. How do they compare?—A. I do not think they are as good as goods made in England.

Q. Have you seen any of the Japanese cottons?—A. Yes.

Q. How do they compare?—A. Very well made, indeed.

Q. Do you understand the cotton manufacturing industry is rapidly increasing in Japan?—A. It is said to be and must be, because I believe the Japanese took something like 100,000 bales of cotton from this country last year.

Q. Do you know what it costs per yard to bring cotton North from Alabama to New York?—A. No; I can not tell you. I was shipping some goods to Shanghai; I believe that is where they were to go. We had already contracted to ship some by way of California direct from the Southern mill, making the New York allowance of freight 53 points. We made some shipments that way, but it came out we could send the goods by way of New York and by way of the Suez Canal for 98 points, whereas they went for 115 from the Southern mill, against which we allowed 53 points.

Q. You understand Japan is exporting some cotton yarns and cotton cloths? A. I have heard so.

Q. Do you know how wages compare in Japan with Massachusetts?—A. I do not. I suppose they must be a great deal less.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, where is the Clerk now reading?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 93, line 12.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, three days ago the chairman of the committee agreed that I might have fifteen minutes for discussion of a particular subject not in this bill, and I have been waiting until such time as he was willing that I might have it, and having reached the time when there is nobody here but the leaders of the House, he has consented that I shall have it at the present time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising at the present time is to make some comment upon a matter that has just been given out by the Post-Office Department on the question of rural mail boxes. I will read from it, and then comment on a portion of it and add it in full at the conclusion of my remarks. I would like to have the attention of the leaders of the House as I comment upon what the Post-Office Department has given out as a justification for requiring rural mail patrons to use and put up prescribed boxes. I now read from said statement, in part, as follows:

When rural delivery was first introduced as an experiment, and up to August 1, 1901, there was no requirement as to the kind of boxes to be used for the reception of mail on rural routes, but patrons could and did erect any sort of receptacle for the purpose that suited their fancies, and those included every conceivable sort—cigar and cracker boxes, oil and powder cans, old bootlegs, tiling, rabbit gums, and shingles nailed together—affording no protection from the weather, and were as unsightly as they were inappropriate.

As a result of this condition the Department was constantly in receipt of complaints of losses of or damages to mail, necessitating investigations involving both time and expense, and also of complaints from the owners of property in front of whose premises such receptacles had been erected by others, and they were a disgrace to the community and to the service, accompanied by demands for their removal.

These complaints became so numerous that the Postmaster-General, with a view to securing the adoption of a standard that would enable patrons to provide themselves with boxes that were weatherproof and fit receptacles for mail, and at the same time would be in keeping with the ideal contemplated for the service, appointed a committee, composed of postal officials, to examine and report upon boxes submitted to it. This committee selected fourteen boxes from the number submitted, and these were approved by Department order of March 28, 1901, and it was required that in all rural free-delivery service established on and after August 1, 1901, only these boxes should be erected and used.

It having developed that the order of March 28, 1901, gave the manufacturers of the fourteen approved boxes an advantage in the business of supplying boxes, another order was issued by the Postmaster-General, dated July 9, 1902, providing that in all service established on and after October 1, 1902, patrons must provide themselves with and erect boxes conforming to the specifications therein set forth and approved by the Postmaster-General, as provided in the order. By the terms of this order any person or firm could secure the approval of and manufacture boxes, provided they conformed to the specifications and requirements.

In a former part of said statement the following appears:

It is true that patrons of the star-route mail service are permitted to erect and receive their mail in any sort of receptacle they may see fit to erect, while patrons of rural delivery are required to provide themselves with "approved" boxes, but the purposes and requirements of the two services are essentially different. In the star-route mail service the primary object is to furnish post-offices with a supply and dispatch of mail, which service is rendered by a contractor, and incidentally to deliver to and collect mail from the boxes of patrons along the lines of these routes, wholly at the risk of the patrons, but this latter service is not general.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I do not rise for the purpose of using hard language toward the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. I have not the honor nor pleasure of his personal acquaintance. I never met him. I do not know Mr. Spillman, the superintendent of rural delivery, and I never met a more pleasant gentleman and never talked with an official that seemed to understand better his duties and to perform them more faithfully.

I take it that these regulations have been inherited by the present officials, that they came down to them from their predecessors, and I will not hold them responsible for the institution of these regulations; but I do hold them responsible for not modifying and abolishing them where they are not found to be justified or for the best interests of the service, and to that end I introduced a bill on the 30th of April last which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18802) providing for the construction and erection of rural free-delivery mail boxes.

Be it enacted, etc., That patrons on all rural free-delivery mail routes now established or that may hereafter be established may put up for their individual use boxes constructed of such material, either wood or metal, as they desire, subject to all existing and such future regulations of the Post-Office Department as may be prescribed by the Postmaster-General, and that carriers on all rural mail routes shall deposit mail in such boxes in like manner as in boxes now in use.

I have been unable to get the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to act on this bill. The chairman of the committee is opposed to this bill. But in the Senate the bill was put on as an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill, except that it left out the provision for the regulation of the boxes by the Department. Now, this statement from the Post-Office Department leaves the impression upon the public that the patrons of the rural free-delivery service, when not required by ironbound regulations, put up old boot legs, cigar boxes, oil cans, powder cans, and tiling.

As every Congressional district in the United States is represented on this floor, I want some gentleman to rise and inform me if the people of his district had no more pride and no more self-interest than to be guilty of that which is here charged. I want to say that, so far as my own district is concerned, there is not a word of truth in it. There is neither white nor colored, Caucasian or negro, in my district to whom the service was extended that has no more self-interest and pride than to put up the kind of box here charged. I ask the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to specify and let us know where the people live, whether North, East, West, or South, that are guilty of what is here openly charged. If people who are furnished this service at the Government expense have no more appreciation of it, the right treatment would be to discontinue it instead of prescribing that they must buy an approved box.

Mr. Chairman, if the question were that the Department should prescribe the essential features or dimensions or manner of putting up, the manner of opening and fastening boxes, leaving the patron to make them, as my bill provides, there would be no objection made.

The Department has approved boxes made by certain individuals and manufacturers, and every time we send in a petition signed approving the establishment of a rural route directions are sent out, including a sheet upon which the names and addresses of manufacturers are given whose make of boxes has been approved from whom the patron can procure the box. The Post-Office Department by this act is advertising at public expense the business of private individuals and corporations. Why can not the Department provide that these boxes may be either of wood or metal, 14, 15, or 20 inches long, a foot deep if necessary, and a foot wide, and shall be so constructed as to protect the mail from the weather, and leave the citizen, the patron, to make the box himself or have it made according to the regulations, without prescribing that he must buy the box of a selected manufacturer, corporation, or individual?

Mr. TIRRELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. TIRRELL. Does not the gentleman think it would be desirable to have a uniform box, so that it would be recognized as the United States post-office box, and so that you would have a uniform box, and how could you get a uniform box without the method adopted by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. SIMS. They are not now uniform, as stated in that communication. The price ranges from 50 cents to $4. This of itself shows they are not uniform. I have read to you that the Department permits boxes to go up on the star routes without any kind of regulation. Now, I want to make the charge, and it can not escape the common sense of any Member of this House, that if the same people on the rural route, unrestrained, will put up boot legs for boxes that they will do it on the star routes where unrestrained. Yet they are not required to put up any kind of an approved box on the star route, but the Department says the dignity of the carrier ought to be considered—in substance, that he is appointed by the Civil Service Commission, and that he is this, that, and the other. Why, if the President of the United States were going to deliver a letter in a box, does it make any difference to the President whether that box was made by the patron or by his neighbor, or has the approving stamp of an autocratic individual upon it from the Department?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If you were to change the law, would you require the Government to follow the directions of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and the law relating to rural carriers in this, that when the mail is put in the box the individual who takes that mail from the box, who performs any depredation upon the mail or to that box, shall be criminally liable; or would you carry out the other idea, as advocated by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that so soon as the mail is deposited the Government has lost all control over it and there is no liability for any depredations to it, except such liabilities as would come under the State law for depredation in the way of stealing or purloining?

Mr. SIMS. I would adopt the action and ruling of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General instead of the Fourth Assistant, if I could do so, but even if we have United States supervision in the nature of the extension of criminal statutes to the boxes it still does not necessarily follow that the Department must approve the identical box used.

Mr. LLOYD. Is the letter to which the gentleman referred one that was received from the Postmaster-General or from the Fourth Assistant?

Mr. SIMS. It was given out to the newspapers by the Post-Office Department. A newspaper man gave it to me and said it came from the Fourth Assistant.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman is aware, is he not, that the Postmaster-General says that they have now under consideration a method of determining which system shall be adopted, that which is now adopted by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to wit, that a man can put up any kind of a box he pleases, or that which follows the rural system, requiring a certain specified box?

Mr. SIMS. No; I did not know that.

Mr. LLOYD. The Postmaster-General now has that under advisement, as he said to us, and is to settle the matter some way very soon.

Mr. SIMS. I am very glad the Postmaster-General is giving this his attention, but I do not want to get away from my point, although I thank the gentleman for his lucid statement.

If people unrestrained will use a box that is a disgrace, as is herein set forth, then they must now be using them along star routes. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General has refused in my district to establish a rural route because part of the route was served by star route.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. At the present time the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, by refusing to establish rural service over territory served by a star route, is virtually admitting that the star route box service is equal to the rural service. If not, he should establish rural routes where they are served by the star routes, and this he refuses to do. I wish now to read a letter to the House. I know the impression is that this trouble comes from the South. I have received more letters from the North than I have from the South, approving my bill. I will read one which was sent here to me and the one which inclosed it. They are as follows:

LEWIS F. LINDAL,
ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW,

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SIMS: I received your letter of recent date and also copies of your speech on the rural mail-box question. I wish to thank you heartily for the same.

This question is beginning to come to the notice of the people of western New York (my native State), they having learned only a short time ago of your bill to do away with "approved" boxes. I inclose you a letter which I received this morning which explains itself, and which I hope you can make some use of. The writer is the secretary of the county grange, a very strong organization in that section of the State. I suggested to him that this matter be taken up by the grange If you have any literature which you would care to send to New York for the purpose of agitating this question, I should be pleased to furnish you the names of persons for that purpose who would be apt to push the matter.

Yours, very truly, LEWIS F. LINDAL.

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY POMONA GRANGE,
Jamestown, N. Y., June 1, 1906.

LEWIS F. LINDAL, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I noticed in a local paper to-day that a bill had been introduced in Congress for the relief of patrons of rural free-delivery service who do not happen to have "approved" boxes. In this section one of the patrons has made 75 or 100 boxes for his neighbors. They were made of galvanized iron, the same dimensions of an "approved" box. My box was used first August 16, 1900, almost six years ago, and is just as good as the day it was erected. Now, I have received notice from the Post-Office Department I must get an "approved" box or not receive mail by carrier. It is certainly most unreasonable, as my box is much better than my nearest neighbor's, who has an "approved" box, but has had it painted three times to keep it from rusting out entirely, but that box is all right because it is "approved." I sincerely hope a bill for our relief will pass Congress. I shall be very glad to hear from you in regard to this bill, and what may be done by the patrons who do not have "approved" boxes to secure its passage.

Most sincerely, yours,

A. A. VANVLECK.

It will be seen that where patrons put up galvanized-iron boxes, that were better than the approved boxes, before the Department made the order for the approved box, they were compelled to take them down and to lay aside a box in every respect better and more protective to their mail than the boxes approved by the Department. Besides, these approved by the Department are nearly all patented; I don't know but that they all are patented. A patent is a monopoly, and when you prescribe that the citizen shall only use patented boxes you say he must patronize a monopoly; and what could appeal to a free citizen as a greater outrage or a more tyrannous practice than for a Government official to say that he must lay aside a box he had already put up of superior make and quality and put up an inferior box simply because the word "approved" was not stamped on the first box?

Mr. POU. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. POU. I understand on reliable authority that some of these boxes that are sold for $1.25 do not cost over 25 cents. If the Government is going to require patrons of this service to use a particular kind of box, do you not think it but fair and just the Government should furnish the boxes to the people at a fair cost?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what it is going to lead to, and the gentleman who has addressed me has introduced a bill along that line. It is more logical and just than to require them to put up a patented article with a Department approval, but I am not in favor of that. The people are willing to make and erect their own boxes and put them where convenient for the carrier—boxes that are a protection to the mail and which in all respects serve the purpose as good as any patented monopolistic box now in existence made of steel and iron, which we know to-day is controlled by one of the most gigantic trusts of this nation. This matter is now in conference on the post-office appropriation bill, and the conference committee can shape the Senate amendment in the bill so as to make it apply. Why not provide in general terms that boxes must be of certain dimensions that will answer the service, without saying to patrons you must buy from certain manufacturers, and give a list and advertise these manufacturers free of cost to themselves, who are in the first instance protected by Government monopoly in the way of patents?

Mr. Chairman, to go into this matter further would require more time than I feel like asking the committee to give me at this time. [Applause.]

The following is the full text of the paper from which I have quoted:

There has recently been considerable discussion on the subject of the requirements of the Post-Office Department affecting rural mail boxes, such discussion including suggestions that patrons of the service be permitted to make their own boxes and that the boxes may be either of metal or wood, no restrictions as to size, material, and manner of construction to be imposed. Most of the arguments advanced against the existing practice of the Department have been to the effect that as any kind of mail box may be used in the star-route mail service, patrons of rural delivery should be accorded the same privilege and that they should not be required to buy "a patented box at an excessively exorbitant price."

It is learned, upon inquiry at the Post-Office Department, that in return for the vast sums of money expended in maintaining rural delivery and the inestimable benefits derived through it patrons of the service are asked to do but two things, namely, to provide themselves with and properly erect suitable boxes, which are weatherproof and fit receptacles for mail, not necessarily boxes that are patented, and to maintain the roads over which rural routes are laid out in condition to be traveled with facility and safety at all seasons of the year.

It is true that patrons of the star-route mail service are permitted to erect and receive their mail in any sort of receptacle they may see fit to erect, while patrons of rural delivery are required to provide themselves with "approved" boxes, but the purposes and requirements of the two services are essentially different. In the star-route mail service the primary object is to furnish post-offices with a supply and dispatch of mail, which service is rendered by a contractor, and, incidentally, to deliver to and collect mail from the boxes of patrons along the lines of these routes, wholly at the risk of the patrons, but this latter service is not general.

In the rural delivery service the delivery of mail to and the collection of mail from patrons is the principal object, the supplying of intermediate post-offices being purely incidental to the service, where rendered necessary owing to the discontinuance of such supply by star-route carrier. But besides this, rural delivery affords to its patrons all the postal facilities to be had at post-offices—the sale of stamps, stamped envelopes, stamped paper and postal cards, the registry of mail, and issuance of money orders. Rural carriers are appointed upon certification from the Civil Service Commission, and from the nature of the service they are required to perform must possess higher qualifications than those necessary or demanded in the star-route mail service.

When rural delivery was first introduced as an experiment, and up to August 1, 1901, there was no requirement as to the kind of boxes to be used for the reception of mail on rural routes, but patrons could and did erect any sort of receptacle for the purpose that suited their fancies, and those included every conceivable sort—cigar and cracker boxes, oil and powder cans, old bootlegs, tiling, rabbit gums, and shingles nailed together, affording no protection from the weather, and were as unsightly as they were inappropriate.

As a result of this condition the Department was constantly in receipt of complaints of losses of or damages to mail, necessitating investigations involving both time and expense, and also of complaints from the owners of property in front of whose premises such receptacles had been erected by others, that they were a disgrace to the community and to the service, accompanied by demands for their removal.

These complaints became so numerous that the Postmaster-General, with a view to securing the adoption of a standard that would enable patrons to provide themselves with boxes that were weatherproof and fit receptacles for mail and at the same time would be in keeping with the ideals contemplated for the service, appointed a committee composed of postal officials to examine and report upon boxes submitted to it. This committee selected fourteen boxes from the number submitted, and these were approved by Department order of March 28, 1901, and it was required that in all rural-delivery service established on and after August 1, 1901, only these boxes should be erected and used.

It having developed that the order of March 28, 1901, gave the manufacturers of the fourteen approved boxes an advantage in the business of supplying boxes, another order was issued by the Postmaster-General, dated July 9, 1902, providing that in all service established on and after October 1, 1902, patrons must provide themselves with and erect boxes conforming to the specifications therein set forth and approved by the Postmaster-General as provided in the order. By the terms of this order any person or firm could secure the approval of and manufacture boxes, provided they conformed to the specifications and requirements.

Since the promulgation of this order, 199 individuals and firms have qualified as the manufacturers of 299 different styles of approved boxes, varying in price from 50 cents to $4 each, the average price per box being about $1.

Since its promulgation on July 9, 1902, the Department has been steadily, but without undue harshness, enforcing the order and eliminating all nonapproved rural mail boxes, whether erected prior or subsequent to October 1, 1902, the date the order became effective, and out of the thousands of boxes condemned complaints have been received from not more than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the patrons affected.

The process of eliminating the nonapproved and otherwise unsuitable boxes has been nearly completed, and practically all of the boxes now in use on rural routes are those which have been approved. A relaxation of the rule described would undoubtedly within a short period reestablish the discreditable conditions which prevailed in the matter of boxes before approved boxes were required.

The Clerk read as follows:

For extraordinary repairs of the Executive Mansion, to be expended by contract or otherwise, as the President may determine, $35,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee what expenditures or extraordinary repairs are contemplated by this provision?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will turn to the hearings, Colonel Bromwell, when before the committee, gave a detailed statement——

Mr. PADGETT. Is it not a fact that within four years we have spent about $700,000 repairing the Executive Mansion and putting it in condition?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think it is a fact; I do not know the exact amount that has been expended.

Mr. PADGETT. Something like six hundred thousand or seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. Six hundred and eighty thousand dollars is the exact amount.

Mr. PADGETT. That is nearly $700,000, and I did not suppose we would be called upon for extraordinary repairs so early.

Mr. TAWNEY. My colleague on the committee [Mr. SMITH of Iowa] is more familiar with the details of that extraordinary expenditure than I am, and I will ask him to explain the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. At the ordinary east entrance of the White House, where guests are received at formal functions, the gentleman will remember that guests pass back through a narrow hall, with cloakrooms upon both sides. Just south of that building is a covered way, or a way with columns, to the south, along which some of the guests are escorted and allowed to enter directly to the basement of the old building. It is proposed to inclose that covered way, so as to vastly increase the facilities for getting people into the White House at receptions and other functions there.

Mr. PADGETT. Open that way to more people than now?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, it will accommodate several times as many people, in my judgment, as it does now, and it is believed, and experience has demonstrated, that this entrance is so narrow and the accommodations so poor and delay so great to the guests who are being received there, it is only proper that this means of ingress and egress from the White House should be widened so as to expedite the movement of the crowd both ways.

Mr. RUCKER. May I ask the gentleman a question? How long is it likely to be before the improvement will be completed?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, during the next fiscal year.

Mr. RUCKER. I am glad of it, because, from present indications, a great many people are going to the White House in the next few years. This item also covers other extraordinary improvements at the White House.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words, supplementing the remarks of my friend from Tennessee, respecting the ruling of the Post-Office Department, that patrons of the rural free-delivery service shall not make their own boxes, but must buy boxes put on the market by the trusts. I am not making these remarks for home consumption, either; I want to appeal to the Members of this House to pass a bill allowing the patrons of this service to make their own boxes or have them made. Gentlemen, why should these people not be allowed to make their own boxes? The Post-Office Department could say what kind of a box should be made, and the patrons of the service could easily have boxes made conforming to such requirements; and they could have boxes made just as good as those sold by the trusts, just as good as those the Postmaster-General requires them to use, at about one-third of the price they are compelled to pay now.

A few weeks ago I went into a hardware store where a large number of these boxes were on sale, and I was told by the proprietor of that establishment that boxes which he was compelled to sell for $1.50 could be manufactured for 30 cents. He said he was forced to sell at a profit and could not afford to charge less than $1.50 for one class of boxes and $1.25 for another, but that either kind of box shown could be made for about 30 cents. I am told that a worthless sort of box is offered for 50 cents, but the point I am trying to make is this: It is wrong to allow the Post-Office Department to say to the patrons of this service, "You must use boxes prescribed by this Department or you shall not have your mail delivered to you. You shall not make your own boxes. You shall not employ some one else to make them, but you must buy from manufacturers who enjoy the favor of this Department or you shall be denied the benefit of a service which you yourselves largely pay for." This, Mr. Chairman, is in effect what we allow the Post-Office Department to say, and I declare to you it is wrong.

Why shouldn't the people be allowed to provide their own boxes in accordance with reasonable requirements? Will any gentleman rise here and now and give one single reason why they should not be accorded this privilege?

Let the truth come out. Is it not because the Department wishes to help certain manufacturers? It can not be because of the necessity for uniformity in the kind of boxes used, for there is no uniformity nor is there any necessity for such uniformity. I believe I have myself seen half a dozen different shapes of boxes. All that is necessary is a box which will keep the mail dry. I see no reason why wooden boxes may not be used, but I will not press that suggestion. Let the boxes be made of sheet iron or any other metal; let the Department make any reasonable and sensible requirement, and then if the trusts can put their boxes on the market cheaper than the people can have them made, then the people will probably buy from the trusts; but in the name of common decency don't let a ruling stand which requires, compels, forces millions of American people to patronize the trusts. God knows we are largely at the mercy of the trusts anyway, but let us frame a law which will stimulate the manufacture of these boxes in every town in the land. There are men in almost every town who would be glad of the chance to make these boxes at prices less than those charged by the trusts.

I wonder if the companies which make these boxes contributed anything to the great fund our present Postmaster-General raised in the last campaign as chairman of the Republican National Committee? They certainly should have contributed to that fund, for they are allowed to charge a profit of 100, 200, and even 300 per cent for goods manufactured by them and which the people are forced to use.

In conclusion, I say, Mr. Chairman, if the people of this country who use the rural free-delivery service are not allowed to have their own boxes made, then the Government should at least see to it that they get their trust-made boxes at actual cost. I have introduced a bill, now pending before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which requires the Postmaster-General to buy these boxes from the lowest bidder and then furnish them to the people through the post-offices of the country at actual cost. I do not know why some action is not taken to prevent the trusts from extorting money from our constituents. I suppose my bill will sleep the eternal sleep of nearly all antitrust bills introduced since I have been a Member of this body; but let me tell you, the people are restless under this great injustice, and the day is not far distant when you will hear from them. This unjust requirement of the Department is one reason why this service is not patronized by many of the people. They can not understand why they are not allowed to manufacture their own boxes. They know they are forced to pay more than the boxes are worth, and rather than submit to a flagrant wrong many of them refuse to buy boxes.

Gentlemen, this is an important matter. Thousands, it is true, have already paid tribute to the trusts by purchasing boxes, but there are thousands who have not, and in the name of ordinary decency, I say, let us emancipate our constituents in this matter, at least, as far as possible from the domination of monopoly. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, his attendants and invited guests traveling with him, to be disbursed at the discretion of the President, $25,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to reserve the point of order upon the clause just read.

The CHAIRMAN. On lines 3 to 6, inclusive, on page 94.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a substitute for that provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I am reserving the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. I offer the following as a substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point of order is first. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, and I wish to ask for unanimous consent for ten minutes in which to give my reasons for making the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. On the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of explaining why he makes the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I reserve the point of order, and ask for ten minutes to give my reason for making it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is really, substantially, and in effect an addition to the salary of the President. It is put here, in the language just read by the Clerk, as "traveling expenses." But it means an increase of the salary of 50 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many salaries that ought to be increased. It is very doubtful, indeed, if Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate ought to serve the people at the present cost of rent and living generally in Washington upon as small a salary as they do. They get nothing but the salary, and every other year Members of this House must run again if they intend to stay in the House. Even in a Mississippi district, where it costs no money to go into an election, where there is no use of money in any wrong way, or even in any ostentatious, legitimate way one can not go through one's district, pay the livery bill, railway fare, hotel bills, and the balance of it for less than $800 or $1,000. That reduces the salary of a Member of Congress, say $1,000 every two years, or to $4,500 a year, say, in round numbers. In addition to that, he must pay for his speeches which go out to his constituents, and must go in order that they may have adequate knowledge of what he is doing here and sometimes they cost a good deal. In my own case, for example—not a perfectly fair average example, perhaps—I paid out over $250 in one week—last week. That, however, is above the average, because of the peculiar party situation which I hold. But no Member can escape a very considerable expenditure for speeches. Then most Members must in a Congressional or Presidential year go on the stump to help their party away from home. Seldom, in a Presidential year, do I get over for less than $700 to $1,000. There are many other expenses attached to the place. One's net salary, after deducting all these, is between $3,500 and $4,000 per year.

Now, then, Members of Congress can not—or, at any rate, I feel as if I could not—vote to take money out of the Treasury and put it in my own pocket, no matter how much it was needed, no matter how much it were deserved, no matter how inadequate. I have seen but one way by which an increase of Congressmen's salaries might be arrived at. That is for Congress to pass a resolution asking the defferent States to have inserted on the State ticket, when they elect Congressmen at the next election, a clause submitting the proposition if Congressmen shall have $7,500 a year, with a place to vote "Yes" and a place to vote "No," a sort of plebiscite, so that Congressmen might not themselves be put in the attitude of voting upon a question where they had a direct interest, so that the people themselves, who pay the money, may decide the question. The question if presented here would be a question I could not meet by an affirmative vote with my view of what I ought to do. But, although there are many insufficient salaries under the Government—some of the Cabinet officers are perhaps paid too little; undoubtedly the Speaker of the House of Representatives is paid far too little; undoubtedly the Vice-President of the United States is not paid enough—although there are some inadequate salaries, the President's salary is not one of them. The President of the United States is paid an abundant salary. In the first place, he gets $50,000 a year. In the next place, he gets all of his clerical aid of every description. He gets upon the rolls of the Government nearly every servant, if not every one, who is employed about the White House. He gets a house free at the public expense. He gets it furnished at the public expense. He gets at the public expense fuel and light and horses and carriages, and even his flowers. We, the people, as I understand, pay the expense of all public functions—dinners to ambassadors, etc. There is almost nothing that the President pays for except his marketing, traveling, and clothes. So that his salary is almost entirely free. Then, all the maintenance is paid for, and this is growing, because I notice that while White House expenses under Mr. McKinley were about $162,000, in round numbers, they are now about $228,000, in found numbers, as I rapidly compute it by adding the figures in this bill and in other bills that pertain to the subject-matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to leave the point of view that this is an increase of salary, and argue it simply as if it were altogether and truly just what it appears to be, to wit, traveling expenses, I want gentlemen to note how this reads—not traveling expenses for the President alone, but "for the President of the United States, his attendants;" and not that alone, but "his invited guests, traveling with him, to be disbursed at the discretion of the President."

But if it were simply traveling expenses for the President himself, I would not be in favor of it. The President might probably have mileage, like Members of the House or Senate, when traveling upon necessary official business, to cover his expenses going to his home from the capital and back. But, Mr. Chairman, what we want to do is to encourage executive, judicial, and legislative officers not to travel, but to stay at their posts of duty. It is getting so that the President of the United States and Cabinet officers are constantly jaunting about the country, very frequently for social purposes and purposes of recreation, still more frequently for political or party reasons—some gentleman says for purposes of edification—getting acquainted with the country, of which one is Chief Magistrate and the others are Cabinet officers. If a man has reached as high a station as that and has reached the age that these men, generally, have reached and yet needs to be taught the geography of the United States of America, he is a hopeless case; and if, as some gentlemen say, the object of providing traveling expenses is that they may "get acquainted with the people of the United States, their wishes, and their sentiments," the same remark applies. If a man has been big enough and broad enough to be President of the United States, he ought to be acquainted with the sentiments and the views and the interests of the people of the United States as fully as a little bit of jaunting about in a private car could acquaint him, and if he needs to be educated in acquaintanceship with the people and their interests at the expense of the people, then he is the wrong man in the wrong place.

Mr. Chairman, a distinguished American once said—and it made the plutocratic gods on the American Olympus shake their sides with laughter and scorn and hatred—that the President of the United States was "the people's hired man."

In a certain sense that utterance is too narrow; but in another sense it is absolutely true. He and you and I are the people's hired men, and we are hired to do certain work; we are paid certain wages to do it; we are, moreover, paid to remain at our respective posts of duty. There is entirely too much traveling around for recreation and sport and for private business and on party business, not only upon the part of the President and the Cabinet officers, but upon the part of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives as well. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Men may just as well get the plebeian notion, if you choose to call it so, in their heads, that they owe service when they are paid money, just as anybody else owes service when he is paid money to attend to a certain job; call it a "job," if you want to, and make the expression as plebeian as you choose. A man goes to the people of a district, or he goes to the people of the entire country and he says: "I consider myself competent to do certain work. I ask you to pay me so much money, title, and honor, and to send me to such a place to do it;" and then after he gets to the place he seems to think he is a sort of a privileged character who is at liberty to do the work or not, just as he chooses. He does not consider the people at liberty to pay the money or not, just as they choose. He always collects the money; I notice that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to continue to reserve the point of order in order that others may be heard upon the subject-matter, if they choose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi reserves the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute, and send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There will be nothing to substitute if the point of order is sustained.

Mr. SULZER. In that case I will offer it as an amendment, and to be a new section in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is not in order, inasmuch as the point of order is pending.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to have it read now for information, and be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after March 4, 1909, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $100,000 per annum, and the salary of the Vice-President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum, and that the President of the United States shall after his retirement from office receive an annual salary of $25,000 per annum for the remainder of his life; and that any former President of the United States living at the time of the passage of this act shall also receive a salary of $25,000 per annum during the remainder of his life.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, is that offered as an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is read for information——

Mr. SULZER. That is all at present. I want to have it pending.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I understand, it is just read for information?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that it be read for the information of the House, and serves notice that later on he would offer it as a substitute or as an amendment.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman from Mississippi requests me to yield to him to make an additional statement, and I yield simply for that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this before I take my seat, that I am sincerely sorry that there happens to be a Republican President when I make the objection, and I beg gentlemen will believe that. I would make it much more freely if it were a Democratic President, because then my motive could not possibly be suspected. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that this would amount to an increase of salary of the President of the United States. If I believed that he were right in that, I would not vote for this proposition myself, for I am opposed to any increase in the salary of the President of the United States. I do not so regard this appropriation. From the day that railroads first came to be operated it has been the practice to extend the privilege of free transportation over them to the President of the United States. Whatever may be thought of the system as applied to others, in my judgment the President owes nothing to a railroad company when it hauls him free over its lines. There is not a place in the United States where a President, of any political party, can travel away from this capital that patriotic people will not hurry to the stations where he is to stop to welcome him and to give him generous greeting.

The result is that when the President is about to start upon one of these semiofficial trips, the railroads of the country are anxious that his special train shall travel free over their respective lines. It brings great revenue to the company, because of the great number of persons who crowd into the towns along the line of the route to welcome the Chief Magistrate. The President's trip being thus a means of revenue and not an expense to the railroad company, I personally see no objection to his riding in a special train without paying for it, though I concede the soundness of all the arguments that are made against free transportation for others. It will scarcely be claimed that when other public officials, beneath the rank of President, travel free over the roads they attract such attention as to compensate the company for whatever expense is incident to hauling them. I therefore think there is no impropriety in the President riding in free trains, even though there be an impropriety in other people riding free over the railroads of the United States.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Then why not, right now, when we are legislating on the pass question, make the President exempt from it? I think you are exactly right about it, and I do not see any sense and never have seen any in prohibiting the President from accepting the courtesies of a railroad company under the circumstances you name.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not on the conference committee on the rate bill, and I do not know what can or what can not be done; but I do know that by the rate bill as it passed the Senate and came to this House, and by the rate bill as it came from the committee of conference, as I understand it, the President is deprived of the privilege of riding over any railroad in the United States. Thus, by this material change in the law, his expenses have been vastly increased.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I make an inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This bill does not provide for increasing the salary of the President of the United States, but it provides for the payment of an expense which has been imposed upon the President of the United States by legislation at this session of Congress about to pass into law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to suggest to the gentleman that under the present law the President has not the right to take free transportation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not prepared, Mr. Chairman, to express an opinion upon the much-mooted question whether that is true or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has been passed upon in a general way by the Cooley Commission and by the Federal courts, and from the construction of the statute by them clearly the President has no right to use free passes in interstate transportation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have heard that it was illegal for him to ride in a free train. I have heard it disputed. I have heard no one claim that he could not buy a single ticket and then ride in a special train.

Nobody claims, so far as I know, that he could not pay a nominal price for a special train. Now, we have swelled his expenses. The question is whether we pay those expenses or are we going to contract the salary of the President of the United States 50 per cent at this session of Congress? It is not becoming that the President of the United States when he travels to greet these people should be compelled to travel without the conveniences of modern railroad life. The places where his schedule requires him to stop are not places where regular trains make sufficient stop for his purpose. It is absolutely essential upon one of these tours that he should travel in a special train. It is absolutely essential that he shall take with him some of his attendants. It is in accordance with all precedent that he shall take with him representatives of the press, his invited guests. It is customary for him when he reaches the boundaries of a State there to meet representatives of that State to welcome him to its soil. It is customary for the governor, the highest functionaries of state, to come to the State line to greet him and to ride upon his train. Are we going to penuriously say that we will pay the expenses of the President that we have imposed upon him by our own legislation, but we will not let him take his wife or his children with him, we will not let him take his attendants with him, we will not let him take with him the representatives of the press on his train, and when distinguished citizens of the State come to meet and welcome him to the State he must not invite them to ride upon his train because the train is paid for by the Federal Government?

It seemed to this committee that this was a provision to prevent the reduction of the salary of the President of the United States, and that the language here chosen covered just the classes of people that a generous, patriotic people would want to provide for during the trip of the President throughout this land. I know of no section of this country in which the President for the time being is not welcome, and it was gratifying to the people of all the country to see the splendid reception accorded the present President on his last tour through the Southern States. Are we to be told now after this splendid welcome that these trips are of no value; that they ought not to be made; that the American people do not want an opportunity to see their Chief Magistrate and have him see them, but that it is his duty to place himself at the capital, not to venture out of it for the term of his service as President, and for that reason we will not pay his traveling expenses? [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in regard to the matter now under consideration. I do not desire to discuss this provision appropriating $25,000 a year to pay the President's traveling expenses. It is undoubtedly subject to a point of order. What I want to talk briefly about is the subject-matter contained in the bill which has just been read at the Clerk's desk—a bill that I introduced at the beginning of this session of Congress—to increase the salary of the President of the United States so that he can afford to pay his own expenses wherever he goes and whenever he travels.

Now, I agree in part with the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, that the salaries of most of the officials of the Government are inadequate and too small at the present time. They should in many instances be increased. The Congress should appoint a joint committee, in my opinion, before we adjourn, consisting of the Members of the House and of the Senate, to revise the salary list of the officials of the United States and report their conclusions and recommendations to us at the beginning of the next session.

There is a demand to-day by the people of this country in favor of increasing the salary of the President. We all know the expenses at the White House are very large, and I do not believe that the Chief Magistrate of the land can save a dollar out of the salary of $50,000 a year. My bill provides that the salary of the President shall be $100,000 a year, but by reason of the prohibition of the Constitution it can not take effect during the incumbency of the present occupant. I do not believe there is an intelligent taxpayer in the country to-day who objects to paying the President a salary of $100,000 a year. It is little enough, all things considered. In comparison with the salaries of Presidents of other countries, the salary of $50,000 a year that we are now paying the President is simply ridiculous. I have no doubt that if the Members of this House were given an opportunity to vote on this bill of mine in accordance with the wishes of their constituents it would be adopted by an overwhelming majority. This bill provides that it shall not take effect until the 4th of March, 1909. It can not apply by virtue of the terms of the Constitution to the present incumbent. It gives the Vice-President a salary of $25,000 a year, and ex-Presidents during their lives a salary of $25,000 annually. It is a good and a just bill, and it should be the law.

It will be remembered that before the last Congress adjourned there was a bill of a similar character pending in this House, and the people all over the country sent up a cry in favor of passing it. The newspapers generally of the country—voicing public opinion—were in favor of it. It failed to pass, however, during the closing days of the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. Now, we ought to pass this bill. It ought to be made a law now, so that the next President will receive a salary commensurate with the great duties and the high responsibilities of the great office of President of the United States. The bill has been pending for months in the Committee on Appropriations. I have done all I could to get it reported, but thus far without avail. I hope no objection will be made to it now and that it will be adopted as an amendment to this appropriation bill. We are a rich country and a great country, and we can afford to pay our President and our Vice-President a decent salary. We are entirely too parsimonious in regard to this matter, all things considered. We are paying our officials to-day practically the same amounts that we paid years and years ago. Many of the salaries paid to-day to great officials of the Government are ludicrous when we consider what these officials could earn in private life. The people of this country want honest officials and competent employees, and, in my judgment, they do not object to paying them comparatively fair and just compensation for the services they render.

Now, sir, I believe that if we adopt this bill, if we agree to this amendment offered by me, that it will meet with the approval of the people of the country. I do not believe they want to be small or mean or niggardly in regard to the pay of the great officials of this Government. We are paying practically, as I said, many of them to-day just what their predecessors received at the beginning of the Government, when we were a small Republic of thirteen States, with a population of only a few millions. To-day we are the greatest Republic in the world. To-day we are the greatest power on earth. To-day we are the richest country in all the ages, and destined to grow greater and richer. We ought to pay our officials compensation commensurate with their responsibilities and adequate to the duties they are obliged to perform. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I dislike exceedingly to differ upon any question with the distinguished leader of the minority party, but the duty of disagreement in this case is rendered less disagreeable by reason of the fact that this is not and can not be regarded in any sense of the word as a party question. It is true that the expenses of maintaining the Executive Office have greatly increased since the beginning of the Government, but the country itself has grown marvelously in the interval. It has increased from 3,000,000 to 80,000,000 in population. Its wealth has vastly increased, the habits of our people have become more expensive, and there is a greater demand for greater expenditure on the part of the President than there has been before in the history of the country.

I can not regard this item for traveling expenses as in any sense an increase of the salary of the President. To prove that it is an increase of the salary we would have to be shown that the President has in the past been paying his traveling expenses out of his private purse. I believe the contrary is the fact. It can not be regarded as an increase of the salary, but only a proper provision for the traveling expenses of the incumbent of the highest office in the country. The President is obliged to give great public entertainments, and this must come, if his salary is not sufficient to pay it, out of his private purse. I can not agree with the statement that it is not reprehensible on the part of the President to ride upon a railroad pass. He is obliged to sign or veto laws affecting railroads, and riding at the favor of a railroad certainly puts him under some obligation to that railroad, high as his office is, and makes it more difficult to discharge justly his duties to the whole people, in the event of railroad legislation being brought to him for his signature or veto. I believe that we ought not to require the President to ride upon a railroad pass. A few years ago there was much criticism of the President's extensive travel throughout the country because of the fact that the railroads provided him and his friends, his political as well as his personal friends, with free transportation, with food, with drink, and with cigars. That bill was borne by the railroads. I do not think that is a good practice. I would like to see it discontinued, and I trust that if this money is voted no President of the United States will use it for political purposes, but will use it only for legitimate purposes, according to the intent of the act. If he does not find it necessary to use the whole $25,000, the unused portion will go back into the Treasury.

I find that the expense of maintaining the President's office has very largely increased, and I think it is well to read the items to the House, so that we may know exactly what the bill is for maintaining that office. First, there is $50,000 for salary, $4,000 for the improvement and maintenance of the Executive Mansion grounds, $35,000 for repairs to the White House and refurnishing it, and for the furnishing and driving of horses, etc., $35,000 this year for extraordinary repairs to the White House, $6,000 for fuel, $9,000 for conservatory and greenhouses, $3,000 for repairs to greenhouses, $25,000 for traveling expenses, $18,800 for lighting the Executive Mansion and grounds, $510 for six arc lights on the grounds, $20,000 for the contingent fund of the President, $66,000 for clerk hire, etc., and $11,000 for the protection of the person of the President. There is an aggregate of $283,310. That is a very large sum, but, in my judgment, a sum that is justified, in view of the great growth of the nation. If we had a system of taxation that would cause all taxes to fall equally on the shoulders of the people, then the proportionate share of each of our 80,000,000 citizens for maintaining the expenses of this office would be one-third of 1 cent in each year, and for my part I would gladly contribute my one-third of 1 cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the President ought to travel when Congress is not in session. There is a legitimate demand for his presence in all sections of the country. I think it would be difficult to overestimate the value from an educational standpoint, and otherwise, of the visits of the Executive among the people of the United States. I believe he ought to be allowed to travel in such a way as to leave him entirely free of all obligations to the railroads of the country. It is much better, it is much more decent, in my judgment, for the people to pay the bills themselves, and I will gladly vote for this trifling sum of $25,000 for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are confronted with a situation that deserves at least our thoughtful consideration of this subject. It looks now as though it is soon to be illegal for any public official to ride upon a pass. Not only that, but that measure seems to have the approval of the great mass of our countrymen. Now, the President will be placed in this anomalous position. He must remain at home and have no traveling expenses or he must, if he travels, pay his own expenses, or the Government must pay them, or he must accept the courtesies of the railroads, and doing the last named he does as President that which Representatives, Senators, and members of the Supreme Court are not allowed by law to do. Do we want to place him in that position before the country where from the time he starts upon a journey he is confronted by the declaration: "You are doing that which is illegal in accepting transportation from the railroads;" or compel him to pay his own expenses? I was very glad to hear in the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who always says something when he talks, a timely suggestion, that no Chief Executive ought to be allowed to use one dollar of this money, if it is voted, for political purposes in traveling about the country, promoting in a partisan way his own political fortunes. It would be a prostitution of the public money of the country did he take that advantage of the people's generosity toward him, but he should use it, not as a politician, not as a Republican, not as a Democrat, but as the chiefest of Americans.

Mr. SIMS. Who could possibly, with any kind of delicacy, raise any such question upon the President of the United States?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Oh, a great many things have happened in this country we did not expect to happen, and that might. I think the suggestion is a good one, and if this item is to pass, here is the time and place to make it, not in the heat of a political campaign, when some one may be misconstrued or construed for partisan purposes as abusing this privilege. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa, if I understood him rightly, that the President virtually pays his own way by the popularity and increased traffic he gives to the road.

There is scarcely a Member of Congress who does not pay his own way to every political meeting he attends, on the same theory that he carries enough passengers to that meeting who would not otherwise go to reimburse the railroad for carrying him, and oftentimes much more. I hope that in future years, when our Presidents retire from that great office, they will not have to be like two or three of their predecessors were—virtually buried at the public expense; others compelled to sell their libraries and their personal effects to eke out an existance in comparative poverty after having held the greatest office in the Republic. Let us pay enough that our Presidents may at least live in dignified retirement when they go out of office, and have enough left to give them respectful burial.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that we are not receiving enough as Members of this House. One of the saddest things to me is to see a man who has held honorable position in public life, who has given years of honest and faithful service to his country, paid simply enough to meet his current expenses, and when no longer able to serve, is compelled to live at the roadside in comparative poverty while others pass and repass who have grown rich while he has been serving his country for just enough to meet his actual necessities. I am not extravagant, but there has not been a month since this Congress convened that I have lived within my salary allowance, and I am willing to open my books to my constituents or to the country to show them that not one single dollar has been squandered or misused.

So with many Members here on both sides of the Chamber; yet if the honorable gentleman from Mississippi would submit his proposition, with a referendum clause, to the vote of the people, I predict that not 10 per cent in his district or in mine would vote $7,500 as the salary to a Member of Congress; nor in other districts. Not because the people are penurious, but because they do not understand the necessity for the large expenses which a Member must incur.

The Vice-President and the Cabinet officers are not receiving enough. We are sending them back to private life with their fortunes depleted, or in debt, after having demanded of them a certain style of living, to comport with the dignity of the position they are called to fill, by expending several times more than they receive. It ought not to be so. The gentleman from New York has said that this is a great country; a rich country. I would not take advantage of its greatness or its richness, but I do believe that the servant is worthy of his hire, whether it be in public life or elsewhere, not that salaries should be extravagant, but that they should be commensurate with the situation we are called to fill and the day and age in which we live.

I confess I feel like criticising the members of the subcommittee in reporting the large amount that they do for White House repairs. After we had expended nearly $700,000 upon that mansion, then to bring in a bill of $70,000 in a single twelve months to reupholster furniture that you can scarcely see a tarnish on; to regild furniture and pictures that do not need it. The President does not ask it. An attaché, taking a pride in his position, who wanted to see the White House a gilded palace, says: "It is at my suggestion, and not the President's, that I am asking this $70,000." I say, with my friend, make this appropriation and let the President pay his fare, and let him ride as we ride—by paying our way—and not put him under obligation to the railroads nor impoverish his private exchequer. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, some few days ago some remarks I made in the House touching ambassadors' salaries, while understood by the House, were so inaccurately reported in the press as to produce an impression entirely different from that I desired to convey. Inasmuch as there has been considerable editorial comment, I have taken advantage of this opportunity to state my views in regard to salaries generally, and the attitude that Congress ought to take.

In my humble judgment there ought not to be any office within the gift of the people that can not be accepted by any man possessed of the mental and moral qualifications without any sacrifice in any unreasonable degree in a financial way. I believed when I spoke before, I believe now, that our ambassadors should be supplied with legations, and that in many instances their salaries should be increased. I want to do away with the condition of affairs that makes possible the acceptance of such offices by men of large means only. But I took occasion then, I think not inappropriately, to call attention to the idea that this Government was a government of democracy and simplicity; and that while the people believe in good living, they do not believe in any extravagant display of wealth, neither do they believe that a man should be appointed to high place because of his ability to expend large sums from his private purse in public entertainment.

In regard to the item now before the committee, I have no doubt. I believe that this Congress ought to pass such a provision, and I hope that the point of order will not be made. I believe the President of the United States ought to visit different parts of the country. I believe it is good for him; I believe it is good for the people among whom he goes. Much of the misunderstanding that grows up, and which causes nearly all the political bitterness that exists in American public life is due to the lack of understanding between the different sections of the country.

If the men from the North could travel south during the recess of Congress and the men from the South could travel north, we would see an end forever of the bitterness which at times has divided this House, a bitterness often due to geographical causes rather than anything else. [Applause.] Therefore I am heartily in favor of making it possible for the President to travel, and to travel in dignity. He could not take the time from his duties here unless during his traveling he was provided with facilities that would enable him to transact business en route from place to place. To do that requires special accommodations—a special train, special equipment—and that should not be asked either as a gratuity from the railroad companies or as a private expenditure on the part of the President himself, but should be borne by the country at large. [Applause.] I want to see a proper provision made, not only in regard to the President's salary, but in regard to some other salaries. I believe that while this Congress could not vote to increase the salaries of its Members during the life of this Congress, nor could it follow that detestable example once set of voting back pay to its Members, there is no reason in morals, in delicacy, or in anything else that should estop this Congress from fixing the salary to be paid to Congressmen in the future and then let every man go back to his constituents and justify his vote according as he sees fit. I for one believe the constituency that I have the honor to represent would gladly see an increase in the salaries of Members. I want the increase, because there has been a corresponding increase in the cost of living, not because I want to see Members of Congress, the President, or Cabinet officers, or our foreign representatives living in any extravagant style. No man who knows me will doubt that I am sincere in what I have had to say in regard to plain living. The distinction between the living of men of refinement and culture and the living of men whose wealth is so newly acquired as to make them desire to parade it before the world is apparent to any one of sound judgment——

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPERRY. You are advocating an increase of salary for Members of Congress at a proper time. Now, here are the Members' clerks. Would you increase the salaries of Members at a proper time and leave the clerks on $1,200 a year, who are the assistants of Congressmen?

Mr. SHERLEY. If I was going to control the matter, I would do away with a great many makeshifts. I would do away with mileage, which is an outrage, because it gives to one Member who lives a thousand miles away from Washington a very large addition to his salary and gives to a Member who lives close to Washington practically no addition to his salary. I would do away with the stationery account, which is a relic of the past. I would do away with all the little accessories, and I would come out in the open and vote ourselves $7,500 a year, believing that we are entitled to it, and then I might consider the proposition with regard to Members' clerks, but I do not consider that it is anything like as pressing a proposition. I think it is perfectly possible to get good men, glad to have the place, at that sum. I do not consider that that is anything like as pressing as the other. And in speaking in regard to the salaries of Congressmen, I was not undertaking to determine what should be the salary of every particular man who is employed by the Government. That is a little bit bigger contract than I should like to undertake now.

Mr. SPERRY. I think there is far more necessity for increasing the salaries of Members' clerks than for increasing the salaries of Members of Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, of course, the gentleman has his own opinion in regard to what clerks should be paid, but I am not discussing that question.

Mr. SPERRY. Would you not favor that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will meet that question when it is presented, I will say to the gentleman. The one thing that I desire to impress upon this committee is this fact—that the true test in regard to the salary that should be paid to any officer in the public service is this: Is that salary such a one as will enable the man, without regard to his private fortune, to accept the place and live with the dignity that the demands of the office place upon him without necessitating his making a great pecuniary sacrifice? If the salary is sufficient for that, it ought not to be raised beyond it. If it is insufficient under that test, it ought to be raised so that the man shall have a proper compensation and not be required to serve the public at a personal disadvantage to himself.

Mr. SIMS. You would not raise the salary of yourself, a Member, for the term for which you have been elected?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course not. No honest man would break faith with his people. Having accepted the office on the terms of $5,000 a year, if he does not want to serve on the terms under which he took it, he can resign.

Mr. SIMS. But a Senator holds his office for six years. What are you going to do about him?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would give him the same salary that I would give to Members of this House. The point I make is that there is no reason why the House should hesitate to legislate in regard to our salaries in future Congresses. We are the only body on earth that can legislate as to the salaries of Congressmen. And shall we be so cowardly that, believing in our own souls it should be done, we are not willing to vote for it for fear some man might impugn our motives? I for one would be willing to vote to-morrow for a bill increasing the salaries of Congressmen to $7,500, and making it take effect at the beginning of the Sixtieth Congress, and let the Members of this House then go back to their constituents, as all of us have to go back, and justify our vote.

Mr. SIMMS. What about Senators who hold through the Sixtieth Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Senate would await the verdict of the people at this election, and then vote on the bill at the short session following.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In former Congresses the Senators increased the hire of their clerks to $1,500 a year, and recently, at this session of Congress, they have increased their salaries to $1,800 a year.

Mr. SHERLEY. My response to the gentleman is simply that I do not desire to broaden out this discussion so as to include that proposition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It is along the same lines.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection to the gentleman stating his own views of that subject.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I thought it ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I differ with the fundamental principle laid down by the gentleman from Kentucky. I would like to see a state of things where, whenever a man accepts a public office, of high legislative or executive character, he would know beforehand that he had to hold it at some personal or financial sacrifice, because that would weed out and keep out very many greedy, selfish, and purely self-seeking and money-seeking people from the public service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the people of the United States would or would not indorse a proposition to increase the salaries of Members of the House and Senate if submitted to them on a plebiscite, I, of course, can not say, but I believe that they would, and I believe that they are the proper parties to pass upon it. I think still that the question ought to be submitted to them and not to us ourselves, the parties interested. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that there ought to be "proper provision for the salary of the President," but I have just argued that there is "a proper provision" for the President's salary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to read a part of the language of section 1, article 2, of the Constitution of the United States:

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected.

Now, if it stopped there there might be some reasonable room for constructive doubt about the meaning, but it goes on:

> And he shall not receive, within that period, any other emolument from the United States or any of them.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi right there explain how an appropriation to pay the traveling expenses of the President, to be expended only when he does actually travel, constitutes an emolument?

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the simplest course of reasoning in the world. If we did not pay it, he would have to. That is a very simple answer. He gets exactly the same pecuniary advantage both ways.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman from Mississippi explain how it differs from the provision furnishing a residence for the President, which he would have to pay for if we did not furnish it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not differ at all, but that was done by general law. Before any President ever lived there we provided by law for a mansion; for furnishing and keeping it furnished and repaired. It is our house and not the President's. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to think that the only alternative—if the country does not pay the President's traveling expenses—is they should be paid by the railroad companies. That is not the alternative. The alternative, and a very right one, is that he should act as any other American gentleman does when he goes traveling. He can ride down to the depot, buy him a section in a Pullman palace car and a railroad ticket, and go on. Now, immediately I know that in some of your minds arises the idea that he would be in personal danger. Gentleman, as sure as you are born, if you look at the matter from a psychological standpoint, you will conclude with me that the President who was not surrounded by any degree of mystery would be absolutely safer to-day than the President who is surrounded by it. General Grant could walk out on the streets when he chose, step over to the Riggs House and buy a cigar, and loiter down Pennsylvania avenue.

The human mind is a curious thing. The old idea of forbidden fruit and the effect of the fruit being forbidden prevails throughout it. The man that anybody can kill nobody wants to kill. If you and I to-day, as Members of the House, or if Senators, were surrounded by detectives and by guards; if whenever we went traveling it was thought that we had to go in such a way as that, nobody could get at us—there would be anarchists of all sorts, lunatics and fools taking pop shots at you and me all the time. [Laughter.] That may seem curious, but from my knowledge of psychology I believe every word of it. It might perhaps work hard for the first President who tried it, but after getting accustomed to it, I know that on the whole it would be safer for everybody.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER], as I said, says that the Presidents when they are going around on these tours to be paid for by the people, if this provision is enacted, ought not to make political speeches. Of course they ought not to make party speeches, but they are bound to; they can't help it; it is human nature. Suppose the gentleman was a Republican President, and he was going around making speeches to the country. What would he make speeches on? Public questions; and he could not possibly make a speech on a public question from any other standpoint than a Republican standpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I were President and going around making speeches upon public issues and public questions, and those are the only questions the people want to hear a President upon, as a rule—he may go now and then to an exposition and open something [great laughter]—I mean the fair, though other things are sometimes opened there, things with corks in them—I notice that even there the President's speech is always seasoned with his political bias or cast of thinking. If I were President going around making speeches they would bear the political cast of my party for the simple reason that I would not know how to make them any other way, if I were talking about public questions at all. My Democracy is absolutely ingrained in me and just as much a part of my mental fiber as one of these muscles is of my bodily fiber, and there would be no possibility of my divorcing myself from it, and so it is with all of them.

So it comes down practically to this, that the country does to a large extent—if it undertakes to do it at all—the country will to a very large extent pay the traveling expenses of the President for the purpose of making party speeches, speeches tinged with partisanship, but that would be as fair for one party as the other, and I would not complain about that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to something else. There is my friend Mr. GARDNER, from Michigan. He is one of the best Democrats spelled with a little "d" that I know of, and yet unconsciously so much has this modern spirit inhabited within us, unconsciously this morning he spoke of the Presidents of the United States after they had retired from office going back to private positions after having worn the "American crown." There is no American crown; that idea is what we want to get rid of. We want to get rid of that idea. And my friend from New York, Mr. SULZER, compares the President's salary with that of "other potentates," and this spirit is all around in the air. We ought not to pension Presidents, either. I disagree with the gentleman from Michigan there, too.

A good deal has been said lately about what we are going to do with our ex-Presidents. What are we going to do with our blacksmiths, what are we going to do with our Senators, what are we going to do with our Members of Congress, our judges, our carpenters, our dentists, our doctors, and lawyers? Give them equal opportunities and equal burdens under a free government! That is what we are going to do with them, and that is all we ought to do with them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is a man to be forever the favored of a nation because he has been for a while its favorite? Gentlemen have come and talked to me about putting Presidents or officials here in Washington on a pension list, and I have said to them, "All right, if you will adopt the same rule for everybody—for the poor old blacksmith and the poor old carpenter, who have worn themselves down working for a scanty livelihood, and in old age are unable to support themselves. If you are going to rank paternalism like they have in Germany, your position is at least debatable; but when you want to select the already favored ones to make them more favored and to keep up the favoritism for life, regardless of the question of service, it is not even debatable." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that Congress should appropriate for the traveling expenses of the President. I stated that frankly when consulted about it a short time ago. I am unable to distinguish in principle between paying his traveling expenses and furnishing him with a house, with servants, with horses, with carriages, and with the other conveniences and comforts necessary for him to live in a proper way. It is not possible for the President of the United States to travel in the same manner that an ordinary citizen does. It is necessary that he be in a position to transact public business wherever he be, and for that reason he necessarily is accompanied by certain attendants and assistants. The American people have come to regard it as a right to know all of the time what the President is doing, and what his particular status happens to be. For that reason it has always been the custom to have a certain number of representatives of the press accompany the President upon his trips about the country. I am not in entire sympathy with the committee in the form in which this item appears in the bill, and I think I am safe in saying that the minority of the committee were more inclined to support a provision which, if no point had been made to this provision, would have been offered as an amendment, and which would have provided "for the traveling expenses of the President, members of his family, attendants, representatives of the press, and officials of the United States accompanying him" on his travels. Beyond that, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we should go. If the President desires to have some personal friend, some man in private life, accompany him upon a part or upon all of a trip to some portion of the country, there is not only no obligation, but no reason to expect the American people to bear that expense.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague permit an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want just to make a statement as to the committee's purpose in using the language it has in carrying this appropriation. We all know that in traveling from one State to another it is the custom for the President to invite the governor and other State officials to accompany him through that State or through a part of the State, and he must necessarily, therefore, have some invited guests, guests that he would be practically compelled to have. It was to meet that condition, in order to avoid any complication in the Auditor's office or the Comptroller's office, that we put in the words "invited guests," and I think everybody recognizes the fact that the President traveling throughout the country must necessarily have a smaller or greater number of invited guests.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood that was the purpose, but I know of no reason why the Federal Government should pay the traveling expenses of the governor of some State or of some distinguished gentlemen who wish the privilege of riding a portion of the distance through the State with the President. I would be only too happy to pay my traveling expenses for an opportunity to travel upon a train with a Democratic President throughout the entire State of New York. [Laughter and applause.] I know that any Democratic governor of that State would be equally pleased to pay his expenses, not only with a Democratic President, but with a Republican President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman from New York speaks about invited guests being paid for by the President or somebody.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; by the people; by the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman said if the President wanted to invite his guests to go with him, the Government ought not to pay for it. Could the gentleman suggest any practical way in which that could be arranged, in view of the fact that no fares are collected on special trains. What would he expect the President to do? To put back into the Treasury an amount equal to the fare of each invited guest when it cost no extra money to have this guest with him? Would he expect the President to make a computation of what the board of each guest cost at his table and to turn that into the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it does not cost anything to carry these people, there is no necessity for authority to pay for them. If it does cost, it is objectionable. I understand that the train is furnished—I am not in the habit of hiring special trains—but that the practice is to charge so much for the train or car regardless of the number of persons occupying it, so that if the President would be charged so much regardless of whether he had Tom Smith or John Jones with him, then there is no additional pay for the fact that John Jones accompanied him.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But suppose this guest sits at the President's table on this train and eats a portion of the food? Are you going to require the President to make an accounting and ascertain how much that is worth which his guest eats?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; I think that is quibbling.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It may seem like quibbling, but that is just why the language was put in to cover identically that class of transaction, and it seems to me that it is a small matter to complain of being paid along with the other expenses of the trip.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, my objection is, as already stated, upon the ground that it goes beyond what Congress should do. I am inclined always to accept the estimate of the President of the money required for his comfort and convenience as President of the United States. I am not inclined to inquire too closely as to whether one sum or another will be proper. I am willing to let the President determine that. But in legislating, in determining the particular use to which money can be put, I think that the same care and particularity should be used and exercised regardless of whether it be the President or some other official. It seems to me that if provision were made for the traveling expenses to cover the classes indicated that there could not be objection that it was not sufficiently broad. I believe that it is wise, from my point of view—I may differ from others—for the President to go about. I recollect some years ago I stood on a very cold day for many hours in order simply to get a glimpse of a man who was at that time the governor of the State of New York. It is a very rare thing for the President to visit many sections of the country, and my opinion is that it contributes to the welfare and is beneficial to the entire country to have the people, if possible, see and rejoice in the presence of the Chief Magistrate of the country. For that reason I heartily favor provision for him to go about the country. I do not fear that this can be construed as an "emolument" under the provisions of the Constitution, because the term "emolument" as defined in the dictionaries means reward for labor, compensation for services; and this can in no sense be taken in that light.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It says, "either compensation or emolument."

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Constitution says he shall receive no increased compensation or any other emolument. Now, the term "emolument," as defined in Worcester's Dictionary, is "profit from labor," or "compensation for services, pecuniary gain, profit, lucre, pay." I can not see in any way how there can be any personal gain to an occupant of the White House by having the President's expenses paid when traveling, any more than you could say that it would be personal gain to him if Congress would authorize an additional horse or an additional carriage or additional clerk or servant.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not this on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the point of order was reserved.

Mr. TAWNEY. This motion is on closing debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now make the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he will allow me just three minutes?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman used about half an hour's time this afternoon.

Mr. SIMS. That was on the mail boxes; this is on something more important.

Mr. TAWNEY. This matter has been discussed now over an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion, inasmuch as the gentleman from Mississippi has made the point of order, it is the duty of the Chair to decide, unless some gentleman desires to address the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to state the point of order; first, it is the change of existing law, and, secondly, it is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. A parliamentary inquiry. Was not the motion to close debate made before the gentleman from Mississippi made the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The power to close debate rests with the committee; the power to close debate on a point of order rests with the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. When a motion is made to close debate and a point of order is made thereafter, would the point of order take precedence of the motion to close debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so, because if the paragraph is ruled out there is no necessity for the motion. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Government of the United States has for many years borne in part the traveling expenses of the President of the United States. We annually carry a $20,000 appropriation to provide, among other things, carriages and horses to him, as Commander in Chief of the Army, and we constantly furnish the Mayflower or some other vessel for water transportation to him as Commander in Chief of the Navy.

We have for many years borne a portion of the traveling expenses of the President of the United States. This is simply a proposition to increase the expenditures for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, a large portion of which expenses are already borne. I can not think that it is new legislation so as to make it subject to the point of order. The suggestion is made that it is in violation of the Constitution. Webster's International Dictionary defines the word "emolument" as follows——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Is there any law by which the traveling expenses of the President could now be paid?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have just answered when I stated that for many years a large portion of his traveling expenses have been paid and are paid.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MACON. Is there any public statute that provides for the payment of the traveling expenses of the invited guests of the President?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am inclined to think there is, in the sense of his invited guests that have always traveled with him on the Mayflower, or whatever naval vessel is furnished to him now. Nobody has contended that he is not now accorded transportation under existing law. I shall now turn to the question whether this is "emolument" or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman leaves that, can the Chair ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Has it ever been stated in any appropriation bill, or authorization in an appropriation bill, to say nothing of express authorization by statute, that the President should have permission to travel on the Mayflower or any other Government vessel?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In my judgment it was so written in the Constitution of the United States, when it declared the President to be Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. He has the right, in my judgment, to take the cavalry horses of the Army and use them at the Executive stables, and, as I understand, that very thing is done. I may be in error as to that, but that is my impression. His position as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy entitles him to use the means of transportation of the Army and the means of transportation of the Navy, and this appropriation simply gives him an additional sum for the same purpose that he is now entitled to out of the Army and Navy appropriations.

Now, then, is this an "emolument?"

The word "emolument," as defined by Webster's International Dictionary, is:

Profit arising from office, employment, or labor; gain, compensation, advantage, perquisites, fees, or salary.

If this money is not wholly expended in traveling expenses, it is covered back into the Treasury. This is an extraordinary sum, covering a certain contemplated trip of the Presidents over the country, visiting numerous colleges and other institutions of learning. It is probable that in ordinary years it would not exceed $5,000. He is not to receive a dime of it; and if this be "emolument," then it was an increase of emolument when we put $680,000 in repairs upon the White House during this Administration, and gave him the right to occupy a much better house than he had theretofore occupied, or any of his predecessors.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman whether fuel for the Executive Mansion, lights, ordinary household expenses, come under emoluments in the same sense?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They are none of them emoluments. We have increased the various items. We increased the contingent fund of the White House $2,000 at this session of Congress. We have increased the appropriation for clerk hire time and time again for the White House. These would not come within the definition of emolument, as I understand it, as it was used in the Constitution of the United States. I say this is an appropriation increasing the allowance to the President for traveling expenses that he is entitled to now by his being Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy out of the appropriations for the transportation of the Army and out of the appropriations for the maintenance of the Navy, and therefore it is not new legislation, but simply an increase of the appropriation now being made for this purpose, and there is no increase in the "emolument" within the meaning of the Constitution, and the paragraph ought to be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the gentleman. The President of the United States has the right to order the Eleventh Cavalry, let us say, to come from somewhere and parade itself in front of the White House and drill for his amusement if he wanted it to do so, and the President has the right to order a vessel of the Navy up the Potomac and then to get on it and go on a trip if he wants to. He also undoubtedly has the full right as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to reduce the chief officer in rank and command of the regiment or of the vessel and as Commander in Chief act himself as colonel or captain; but this is the first time that I have ever heard anybody suggest that the could commandeer the railroad system of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, there is no law now, no general law now, outside of this appropriation bill, providing for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, and providing still further for the traveling expenses of his attendants or guests.

This provision would not only change existing statute law, but the fundamental law—the Constitution itself.

Now, in connection with the meaning of the word "emolument" used in the Constitution, my friend from New York did not read quite far enough. The Constitution says, not that an emolument is compensation, but as if to show that it means more than compensation, it says, in the first part of this clause, that the "compensation" shall not be increased or decreased during the President's term, and then later on it says, nor shall any "emolument" be given to the President during the same time. Now, the gentleman did not read quite far enough in Worcester's definition of the word "emolument." If he had, he would have found this next definition:

Advantage, good, or gain, in a general sense.

And it is illustrated by a quotation from that master of good English, the author of the Tattler, old Samuel Johnson, who says:

Nothing gives greater satisfaction than the sense of having dispatched a great deal of business to the public emolument.

Emolument means advantage. It is just a longer word; that is all; a little different, because it leans toward pecuniary advantage. Of course it is just as much pecuniary advantage to me to give me a ticket from here to Yazoo City, which would cost me $27.50, as it is to give me $27.50. That is my plain, common-sense way of looking at it. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the provision is contrary to existing law, as expressed both in the Constitution and upon the statute books, and new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XXI.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or the gentleman having this item in charge, whether he can furnish the Chair with any statute authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will frankly say to the Chair that I know of no specific authority in law for this appropriation. If there is any authority in law, it is to be drawn inferentially from the office and from the appropriations that are made for other branches of the service in connection with the office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that this item is not authorized by existing law, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now ask to have the amendment I offered read again. I offer it now as a new section to the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a new section.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to have it reported.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been reported once.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a new section which will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after March 4, 1909, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $100,000 per annum, and the salary of the Vice-President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum, and that the President of the United States shall after his retirement from office receive an annual salary of $25,000 per annum for the remainder of his life; and that any former President of the United States living at that the time of the passage of this act shall also receive a salary of $25,000 per annum during the remainder of his life.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a word on the point of order. I indulged the hope that the gentleman from Minnesota, who reported this appropriation bill, would have included in its provisions this bill of mine, which is pending in his committee. He did not do so. I am constrained to believe he is opposed to it. Of course it is subject to a point of order, and if the gentleman from Minnesota insists on his point of order we can not get a vote on it. I am sorry for this. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order and give us all a chance to vote on the question. Let those in favor of it vote accordingly and those opposed to it against it. I am in favor of it, and believe the majority of the Members of this House are in favor of it—in favor of paying the President a decent salary. But, sir, I say that sooner or later this bill of mine to pay the President $100,000 a year salary will be a law. The people want it a law, and what the people want they generally get in the long run. That is all I care to say now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the paragraph is clearly new legislation, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs of building where Abraham Lincoln died: For painting and miscellaneous repairs, $200.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have a number of verbal amendments that I wish to offer to this and subsequent paragraphs, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered as agreed to and inserted at the places indicated in the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota states that he has various verbal amendments that he desires to offer, and asks unanimous consent that they may be considered as agreed to and inserted at the proper places. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments are as follows:

On page 97, after line 16, insert "Under Engineer Department."

Strike out the words "in completion of contract authorization" where they occur in lines 24 and 25, on page 98; in line 4, on page 103; in line 10, on page 103; in lines 4 and 5, on page 105; in line 1, on page 106; in line 20, on page 106; in lines 6 and 7, on page 108; in line 9, on page 108, and in line 14, on page 108.

Strike out the word "completing" and insert in lieu thereof the word "continuing" in line 8, on page 100; in line 1, on page 105; in line 8, on page 107; in lines 16 and 17, on page 107, and in lines 21 and 22, on page 108.

Strike out the word "completion" and insert in lieu thereof the word "construction" in line 25, on page 102; and in line 4, on page 106.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Ohio River below Pittsburg, Pa: For continuing improvement by the completion of Locks and Dams Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, and the modification of said locks and dams, and of Lock and Dam No. 6, so as to secure a stage of 9 feet in the pools belonging thereto, $1,281,376.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed that the bill under consideration carries no appropriation whatever for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri to the mouth of the Ohio—that is, from St. Louis to Cairo. The failure to further provide for continuing work on that important stretch of the river at this time is explained by the War Department, whose recommendations, I understand, have been generally followed by the committee, on the ground of an unexpended balance which, it is said, will be sufficient to carry on the present work of dredging and so forth, until the river and harbor bill to be passed at the winter session of Congress will take effect. Reverting to the last report of the Chief of Engineers, I find that on July 1, 1905, there was on hand an available balance of $857,067.04. Assuming that about $400,000 in round figures were expended in the course of the current fiscal year, the amount available for the fiscal year from July 1, 1906, to June 30, 1907, would be about $450,000. I should like to ask my friend from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, whether I am correct in this?

Mr. TAWNEY. The figures cited by the gentleman from Missouri are substantially correct.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Very well. The last sundry civil act, approved March 3, 1905, appropriated $650,000 for this work, but the local officer in charge of it has declined to expend this amount, and states that only "$400,000 should be provided annually for the purpose of maintaining an 8-foot channel by dredging, with such auxiliary works as temporary diking, bank protection, and occasional hurdle building." In other words, he construes the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, to mean an entirely new departure, in that more attention should be devoted to dredging and less to works of permanent improvement.

I want to say here and now, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the Mississippi Valley are not only not satisfied with this construction of the act referred to, but that they most emphatically resent the failure to adhere to the project of 1881, which contemplated works of permanent improvement, to secure by confinement of the flow of the river to a single channel, the required depth during all stages while the river is open to navigation.

For the present we content ourselves with the use of the unexpended balance for dredging and maintenance, with the mental reservation, however, that this is merely a transitory period, to be followed by an era of real, permanent improvement, which alone can convert the Mississippi River, by its navigation, into that great artery of commerce which nature has destined it to be.

We are told that the present traffic on the river does not justify the expenditure of large amounts of money. How unspeakably absurd! Did the traffic across the prairies of the great West justify the enormous outlay for the construction of railroads at the time they were actually built? There was comparatively little traffic there until the rails were laid. There will be comparatively little traffic on the Mississippi until it is made really navigable, and by that I mean until the necessary depth is secured for the larger type of steamers.

Is there any reason why there should not be a great tonnage for commerce on the Mississippi except it be the unimproved condition of the river? While it is true that railroad transportation is cheap, river transportation is incomparably cheaper, and this one factor would fill the river with boats the same as it does the Lakes, if the facilities of navigation were the same. On January 1, 1905, the river at St. Louis fell to a low-water stage of 4.3 feet below standard low water. It was during the closed season, but it is needless to say that such a stage of water would put St. Louis and its great commerce outside of the range of navigation, temporarily at least, and we claim that unless you enable the great city of St. Louis to pour her commerce into the bottoms of the Mississippi boats traffic on that stream will remain the insignificant fraction which it now is of the grand total of transportation. And what a future reveals itself to us when we contemplate the possibility of bringing the great city on the Lakes, Chicago, within the range of Mississippi navigation! We talk about the benefits of the Panama Canal. Why, to our own country a ship canal from the Lakes to the Gulf will certainly be of more immediate, if not of far greater, benefit.

If the men who invested their capital in the great transcontinental railway lines had waited until the traffic had grown large enough to render such investments profitable, these lines would perhaps not have been built up to the present day. But when the rails were laid—I repeat it—the commerce followed, and with the same mathematical certainty as commerce follows the rail it follows the river, provided the river is navigable. I venture to say that if the Mississippi were given over to a private corporation with the privilege to levy tribute upon the tonnage carried on it, it would have been improved at as early a date as the country was given the great benefit of land transportation from ocean to ocean. The absolute certainty of profit would have attracted all the capital required for such a great enterprise. As it is, we must solely rely upon the National Government, and the people are compelled to await its pleasure. It seems to me they have waited long enough, and the time is fast approaching when patience ceases to be a virtue. The parsimony of Congress with respect to river improvements should be changed to a more liberal policy, and instead of continuing to build unnecessary battle ships we should make our great rivers navigable in order to relieve our commerce from the monopoly of railroads by river competition on the one hand and to benefit the railroads by stimulation of trade on the other. It is well to prepare for the possibility of war by providing an adequate navy, but it is immeasurably better to prepare for the exigencies of peace by providing new channels of commerce. To-day we are spending over $100,000,000 annually for the Navy, while the beggarly sum of $15,000,000 is grudgingly given for the improvement of our waterways. From the viewpoint of our national safety these figures could well be reversed, and in the interest of our commerce and the welfare of our people they ought to be reversed. Every dollar spent for preparation for war is lost forever, while the dollar expended to secure water transportation for our products will come back to the pockets of the people with compound interest.

It was a great step forward in the history of our national development when both great parties, after a long-continued wrangle, finally came to the conclusion that under the Constitution it was the province of the Government to undertake internal improvements. But while, as I say, this is now generally admitted, the Government has never come up to either our expectations or the necessities of the case, and compared with the munificent sums the European countries—for instance, England, Germany, France, Holland, and Belgium—have expended in the improvement and building of their waterways, the appropriations made by the American Congress for this purpose really pale into insignificance. Since the Franco-Prussian war France alone has expended nearly $800,000,000 for her rivers, harbors, and canals, which is more than twice the total expenditure by our Government for the same purposes from its origin down to the present moment. "The result, in the countries referred to, of having fostered their waterways," said a speaker at the recent La Crosse convention, "has been a tremendous increase of commerce and tonnage both by rail and by water. With a like liberal policy by our Government toward the improvement of all of our inland waterways—the grandest waterways in the world—who could estimate the growth of commerce of our country that would follow and the good that would thereby come to all the people?"

It is generally known that our trade with Latin America is not what it ought to be, but the real facts are a source of actual humiliation to every good American. The fact is that upward of three-fourths of the imports into the Latin-American countries are furnished by Europe, while the share of the United States is but one-fourth. No Monroe doctrine can change this misproportion. We can say "hands off" to Europe when it attempts to seize American territory, but we can not stop the hand that distributes European products, because the people of Central and South America have a right to buy where they can buy best and cheapest. But why is it they will not deal with us even to the extent of equalizing our mutual balance sheet, which to-day shows a sum of $450,000,000 against us? There is no doubt some truth in the assertion that we neglect to cater to the peculiar tastes and preferences of these people, but that does not tell the whole story. The main reason is lack of transportation facilities and excessive cost of transportation. It was recently stated on this floor that freight from the West to Latin America costs about $30 per ton. If this be true, no other cause need be mentioned for our inability to compete with Europe in these markets. It has also been asserted that if deep water were secured in the Mississippi and the proposed ship canal from Chicago to New Orleans were in operation, freight could be transported to Latin America for $10 a ton, a difference of $20. Is there any further argument necessary to convince us that the improvement of the Mississippi should go hand in hand with the construction of the Panama Canal?

I assert, Mr. Chairman, that the very moment Congress enters upon a policy of liberal appropriations for permanent improvements, especially with a view to bringing St. Louis, Chicago,

St. Paul, Minneapolis, and other large cities within the reach of river transportation to the Gulf, capital will be forthcoming for the construction of boats, barges, and steamers of the larger type; but this need not be looked for as long as there is the same uncertainty with respect to such a policy as there is with respect to navigation to-day.

To give the House an idea of what the commerce of the great city of St. Louis alone amounts to, I will cite a few facts and figures which have been compiled on behalf of the Business Men's League of St. Louis, by Mr. William Flewellyn Saunders, its secretary:

"In 1890 St. Louis received and shipped 16,405,733 tons of goods, and in 1905 this had increased to 39,512,088.

"The increase in population for the ten years of this period, shown by the United States census of St. Louis, was 27.3 per cent. The population of 714,290, estimated for 1905, gives an annual average growth of 4.8 per cent in population since 1900. This increased percentage of growth in population in the five years of the city's "world's fair period" is still only a little over half the average rate of annual increase in business since 1890. The average rate of increase of business annually is nearly three times the average rate of annual increase in population in the decade prior to the world's fair period. Greatly increased in population by the growth of its supporting territory, the city, as a result of the increasing demand from this territory, is stimulated in growth of business far beyond its growth of population.

"During the ten years from 1890 to 1900, St. Louis gained only $40,000,000 in value of manufactured products. In the five years since 1900, St. Louis has gained more than $73,000,000 in value of products, or 37.8 per cent. During 1905 the total value of products was $267,004,314. St. Louis, by these figures announced from Washington, is the fourth manufacturing city of the United States, following New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia, considerably ranking Pittsburg, the tonnage of whose manufactured product, while heavier, is not as valuable.

"During the last three years, 1903, 1904, and 1905, 259 factories were added to the city, with an operating capital of $36,196,900, and during 1905 alone eighty new factories came there, employing a capital of $12,764,000. The most of them were attracted by the reputation of St. Louis as a point where manufacturing is cheap. This reputation is growing.

"During 1904 new mercantile concerns with operating capital of $8,712,000 were established in St. Louis, and during 1905 fifty-one new mercantile establishments, with an operating capital of $11,083,000, began business there.

"There is a demand on the city for manufactures of its own in every line, but especially in the lines of light and fine manufacturing, as well as in glass, crockery, pottery, canned goods, cereal foods, woodenware, furniture, vehicles, farm machinery, drugs, chemicals and paints, light iron and tinware, clothing, hats, and dry goods in general, and perhaps more especially in cotton goods of all kinds, for which both the demand and the supply of raw material are increasing far beyond the response in manufactured supply.

"The city covers 61.5 square miles of territory within its present limits and the great amount of this territory left still unoccupied as the result of the rapid movement of the residence section westward to and beyond the city limits, gives a range of choice for manufacturing sites in St. Louis such as no other large city of the country can offer.

"Inside its present limits St. Louis has 19 miles of river frontage, along which sites for factories can be selected so as to secure the advantage of both water and rail for freights.

"The whole length of its river frontage is paralleled by railroad tracks.

"The entire circumference of the city is inclosed by the belt railroad, to give terminal connections with the twenty-six great railroads which terminate in St. Louis.

"A great part of the Belt line runs through suburban territory, immediately adjacent to the city and still unoccupied, giving opportunity for the location of factories, with modern factory villages for operatives. The Missouri Pacific, the Iron Mountain, the St. Louis and San Francisco, the Wabash, and all the great western roads have tracks through the same territory, reenforcing the Belt line in supplying terminal facilities for factories.

"Practically all this territory is high lands, offering ideal sites for the homes of operatives as well as for factories. Practically the whole territory covered by St. Louis and its Missouri suburbs in high land, becoming so on the Missouri side within an average of not over 300 yards of the Mississippi River.

"Besides its steam railroads, with their passenger service connecting its suburbs with a union station of thirty-two tracks and eleven acres in area, St. Louis has electric roads with 337.67 miles of single track, connecting with a rapidly increasing mileage of electric roads beyond its limits and reaching all its principal suburban districts.

"The great area of building stone, fire and other clays, inside and adjacent to the limits of the city and the water connection of the city, with the principal sources of still unexhausted lumber supply, give the city a greater probability of continued cheapness for building material than can be expected in Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, or in the Atlantic States generally.

"Fuel is cheaper in St. Louis than in any other large city. Actually in sight of the city there are coal fields with an unlimited supply of coal. Coal is delivered to manufacturers at their furnaces in St. Louis at $1.55 a ton, when it is quoted in Pittsburg at $1.65; in Toledo at $2.10; in Detroit, $2.15; in Cincinnati, $2.50, and in Chicago, $1.95.

"No other city of the country has such a railroad connection already established or one which is so rapidly increasing.

"Of the whole railroad building in the United States during 1905, which was 4,388.2 miles, against 3,822.26 in 1904, 1,690 miles, or nearly 40 per cent, was done in the St. Louis trade section of the country, and a very large part of the building of 1906 is planned for this territory.

"Summaries published in October, 1905, by Mr. H. T. Newcome, 'For the railroads,' from reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing reduction in freights per ton per mile in the three great groups of States in St. Louis territory, put the average rates notably below the rate per ton per mile in New England. He gives the reduction for New England in thirteen years as from 18.73 mills per ton per mile to 11.67. In Group VI, including Missouri north of St. Louis, the reduction is from 9.61 to 7.74 in the same period. In the other groups in the St. Louis territory, the rate per ton per mile is stated at from 1.87 to 3.40 mills lower than the lowest New England rate for the period.

"Texas, in this grouping, constitutes a group of itself, with a part of New Mexico added. The relation of southwestern growth in population and shipping capacity to decrease in mileage charges per ton is indicated by the fact that the annual average growth of Texas in a census period of two decades is 4.5 per cent a year in population, while the decrease in the rate per ton per mile for Texas during thirteen years is between 16 and 17 per cent.

"Reenforcing its railroads, St. Louis waterways give it connection with the territory of the upper and lower Mississippi, the Illinois, the Missouri, the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland rivers, whose craft in actual service gave it a tonnage by river in 1904 of 377,935. This tonnage has been doubled in years reported since 1900.

"The navigable mileage of these rivers is: For the Mississippi, 2,200; the Missouri, 1,253; the Ohio, 1,053; the Illinois, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland, 1,309. These rivers alone, excluding other navigable streams such as the Arkansas, give St. Louis a mileage of 5,815 miles of navigable rivers actually in service in the last year.

"No other city in the world has such advantages of combined river and railroad mileage.

"The combined deposits of the banks and trust companies of St. Louis, according to the last statement made, the banks February 6, 1906, and the trust companies November 9, 1905, amount to $268,480,084.40. The surplus and profits on the same date were $47,444,076.57. The capital was $37,050,000.

"St. Louis bank clearings for 1905, amounting to $2,899,798,979, showed an increase of 3.8 per cent over the preceding year.

"The 30,000,000 people within a radius of 500 miles of St. Louis are chiefly buyers of manufactured goods and producers of the food stuffs and raw materials most necessary for the support of successful manufactures. The trade territory of St. Louis is thus an ideal "home market" for manufactured goods, offering, first, the largest local demand with the least local competition, and, second, the largest supply of food stuffs and raw material.

"The increase of the trade territory of St. Louis in population shows the certainty of increasing demand on the city as a distributing point for manufactured goods of all kinds. In two decades, as shown by the Federal census, Missouri increased from 2,168,000 to 3,108,000; Arkansas from 302,000 to 1,311,000; Kansas from 996,000 to 1,476,000, and Texas from 1,591,000 to 3,048,000. Similar increases appear for Iowa, Colorado, southern Illinois, southern Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, northern Alabama, and Mississippi, as well as for the whole trans-Mississippi Southwest.

"With an increase of over 43 per cent in two decades, Missouri is surpassed by Texas, which showed a rate of 91 per cent increase in the same period, and even this rate is greatly exceeded by that of Oklahoma, whose population of 398,000 at the last census represented an increase of over 500 per cent in a single decade.

"Increase in power to support and purchase manufactures has more than kept pace with increased population in the whole territory for which St. Louis railroads and rivers make it the natural home market. The last census makes Missouri the geographical center of production for the leading agricultural staples of the United States, except cotton, the center of production for which also lies within St. Louis trade territory.

"In five leading cereals, the annual product of the single State of Missouri has exceeded that of all the Atlantic and Gulf States.

"An increase of over 100 per cent in the four staples of wealth in direct production took place, between 1890 and 1904, between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains, with a corresponding increase in purchasing power for manufactured goods.

"Between 1890 and 1904, Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, Texas, and the nine other States and Territories of this trans-Mississippi group increased the value of their product of corn, wheat, oats, and cotton from $701,072,224 to $1,713,696,000, or more than double. The greatest increase in population made by any single State in this area during the same period was betewen 60 and 70 per cent. The heavy increase in population is exceeded by the increase per capita in purchasing power.

"During the same time the same States added 149,000,000 acres to the total of their improved farming lands. Their banks and trust companies during the same period showed an increase of over 300 per cent in resources.

"The general increase for the same periods in staple breadstuffs, the center of production for which is in the immediate neighborhood of St. Louis, was between 50 and 60 per cent. The general increase in cotton production was 47 per cent. The excess of the increased percentage of production in the immediate territory of St. Louis over the general is a marked feature of the possibilities of cheapening the cost of production in St. Louis manufactures.

"In thirteen States of the South Central group within the radius of St. Louis trade territory the annual output of iron reaches $10,000,000; of coal, $45,000,000; of metallic ores, other than iron, $16,000,000, with an annual output of mining products raised to the point of raw material aggregating between $90,000,000 and $100,000,000. From these States in 1904, the report of the Southern Lumber Manufacturers' Association, with headquarters in St. Louis, shows the year's output of yellow-pine lumber to have been 5,237,000,000 feet.

"The increase in the actual purchase of manufactured goods as the result of the increasing demand largely from the territory of which St. Louis is the central market raised the percentage of manufactured goods in the total of railroad tonnage from 13.45 in 1899 to 14.39 in 1903, in spite of the great increase in the gross tonnage of agricultural and mining products during the same period.

"The increasing demand for manufactured goods resulted during two census decades in an increase of 243 per cent in the manufactured products of ten North-Central Western States, including Missouri and Kansas, with the States north of them. This increase gives an annual total of $4,311,000,000 for the gross annual output of all manufactures from these States. It is, however, still $2,238,000,000 below the output of the Atlantic States. The character of the product is also different. The advance to the general manufacture of lighter and finer goods lies largely in the future for the whole group of States within the St. Louis radius.

"The growth of St. Louis trade, including with shipments of its own products goods received and forwarded from other markets and manufacturing points, gave a tonnage for 1904 of 39,512,088, an increase of 5,000,000 tons over 1903 and of more than 10,000,000 tons over the tonnage of 1902.

"WHY ST. LOUIS IS GAINING POPULATION.

"The figures above, of course, deal entirely with the commerce of St. Louis; but it must not be forgotten how good a place to live in St. Louis is. This city and Philadelphia lead every other city in the United States in the percentage of residents who own their own homes.

"The increase in the kind of population a city needs to make it strong is shown by the fact that while in 1904, which was the World's Fair year, there were 10,172 real estate transactions, representing $40,289,256, in the year after the World's Fair, when surprise would not have been created had the movement of real estate been languid, the record of the World's Fair was beaten by 15,315 sales being made, representing $78,949,532. This, of course, means simply that the city grew much faster in population during the year after the World's Fair than it did during the World's Fair year itself, and that these people were, many of them, people who wanted to buy homes.

"This is further shown by the enormous increase in building in St. Louis for 1905 over 1904. In 1904, $14,283,732 was spent on building, and in 1905, $23,591,012 was spent on building. This is an increase for St. Louis of 65 per cent, a larger percentage of increase than that of Chicago, which was 32 per cent; Philadelphia, which was 37 per cent, or New York, which was 60 per cent.

"St. Louis is located on high ground, and it has been exempt from all epidemic diseases peculiar to southern America. Its total deaths reported from malarial fever in 1903 were only 61, as against 77 for New York City in the same year. (Report of the Department of Commerce and Labor on American Cities, 1905.)

"The health of the city is due not only to its location on a series of hills rising progressively from the river and to its 579 miles of completed sewers, but to a climate whose averages for thirty-four years give it one hundred and thirty-seven entirely clear days annually and one hundred and thirty-one days in addition to this without precipitation.

"The short period during which it has actually severe winter cold gives it more than nine months of "open-air weather" and materially reduces the expense for fuel for heating purposes as compared with the Northeastern States.

"In more than doubling the area of its residence district since 1890 St. Louis has established close and rapid connection between all parts of the city and suburbs by a complete system of electric railroads. A single fare with free transfers carries a passenger the length and breadth of the city.

"The advantage of residence in St. Louis to a taxpaying citizen is shown very well by comparison of St. Louis with other large cities with respect to its per capita debt, as follows:

	Population (census 1900).	Gross indebtedness.	Per capita debt.
New York City	3,437,202	$593,550,573	$172.69
Chicago	1,698,575	63,488,560	37.32
Boston	560,892	88,164,906	157.15
Cincinnati	325,902	32,884,142	110.87
Buffalo	352,387	18,234,449	51.80
Cleveland	381,768	22,016,294	57.64
Baltimore	508,957	39,964,483	78.51
Pittsburg	321,616	20,178,201	62.66
Philadelphia	1,296,697	50,337,245	48.56
St. Louis	575,238	22,539,278	39.19

"The Department of Commerce and Labor reports the per capita of taxes spent for schools, libraries, and other educational purposes at $4.67 for St. Louis and $4.52 for Chicago.

"Residence property in the city and its immediate suburbs, with all advantages of sewer connection, electric lighting, gas, water, schools, and street-car service, is always available, not only in single lots, but in areas which allow development on the plan characteristic of St. Louis's residence growth—that of the parked city place, or the still more extensive residence parks of the suburbs.

"The same development during the past fifteen years of rapid transit, which left large areas available for factory sites and opened up other still more extensive areas for the same purpose, has insured the future of St. Louis as one of the most beautiful and comfortable residence cities of the country or of the world."

This remarkable array of facts and figures shows what St. Louis alone can and will contribute to the navigation of the Mississippi River when a permanent channel of from 8 to 10 feet will have been secured.

On the strength of this showing the Business Men's League, under date of December 21, 1905, addressed a communication to President Roosevelt, of which the following is a copy:

DECEMBER 21, 1905.

His Excellency THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

SIR: The Business Men's League of St. Louis, representing the commercial interests, not only of St. Louis, but in this matter the people of the whole Mississippi Valley, to the number of more than 27,000,000, respectfully ask that you will direct your attention to the commercial necessity of improving the Mississippi River, so as to make it permanently navigable for freight-carrying steamboats and barges, thereby causing it to become an effective competitor with the railways.

The United States Board of Engineers in Washington and the Mississippi River Commission, which two bodies have to pass finally upon all plans for improvement of the Mississippi River, are agreed that the weak point in the navigation of the river is that part of it between the mouth of the Missouri and the mouth of the Ohio, or, in other words, between St. Louis and Cairo.

The United States Board of Engineers is agreed upon the conclusion that it is practicable to procure a channel from the mouth of the Missouri to the mouth of the Ohio 8 feet deep and 200 feet wide, and to keep it in this condition always, so as to secure safe navigation, for $20,000,000, with an annual expenditure after it is so secured of $400,000 a year for maintenance. This estimate provides, of course, for the proper contraction and protection of the banks of the river. (See Appendix 10 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1904, page 2147, paragraphs A, B, and C.)

If this plan be carried into effect it will in a short time bring back full navigation of the river and the establishment of packet lines and freight-carrying lines between St. Louis and New Orleans, and the river will become within a short time a true competitor with the railways and will regulate the railway rates thoroughly.

The effect of the competition of the river on freight rates north and south is shown at a glance by the comparison by river in 1897, when a line of steamboats, known as the Anchor Line, regularly carried freight between St. Louis and New Orleans, and the present rate by railway, there being now no freight line from St. Louis to New Orleans because of uncertainty in the channel.

	Per 100 pounds.
First-class rate in 1897	$0. 75
Present rate	.90
Second-class rate in 1897	.63
Present rate	.75
Third-class rate in 1897	.55
Present rate	.65
Fourth-class rate in 1897	.42
Present rate	.50
Fifth-class rate in 1897	.33
Present rate	.40
Sixth-class rate in 1897	.28
Present rate	.35

It is conceded that if the Government will assume all responsibility for maintaining a channel between St. Louis and Cairo 8 feet deep and 200 feet wide, so that shipping capital will have confidence in the situation, freight and packet lines will be reestablished and the river will become again an active competitor with the railways.

The fact that when the river is safely and certainly navigable it regulates the railway rates not only north and south from St. Paul to New Orleans, but also east and west from San Francisco to New York, is shown conclusively by the attached statement of Mr. M. C. Markham. Mr. Markham is at present a traffic expert of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, stationed in St. Louis, and at the time he made this explanation of the river's influence upon railway rates he was the assistant traffic manager of the Illinois Central Railway, a line paralleling the Mississippi River north and south. The statement was made in 1901, before the United States Industrial Commission.

We respectfully bring these facts before the President, because unless he urges this appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River there is a possibility that it will not be made, as the passage of a rivers and harbors bill is uncertain.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servants,

JAMES E. SMITH, President.
WM. FLEWELLYN SAUNDERS,
Secretary and General Manager.

The statement of Mr. M. C. Markham, traffic expert, as to the influence of the Mississippi River in regulating freight rates, is as follows:

The river, as can be readily understood, makes the rates from St. Louis to Memphis or New Orleans. The railroads running between those points, to get a share of the traffic, must necessarily offer rates approximating those made by the river craft. Chicago is not situated on the river, but it would be placed at a disadvantage as regards the Memphis or New Orleans trade if it were not put upon a relatively fair rate plane with St. Louis. A railroad company having a line running from Chicago to Memphis or from Chicago to New Orleans may have no interest whatever in St. Louis industries, and for this reason might be glad to give Chicago such rates as would enable it to compete with them. By so doing the Chicago railroad builds up the enterprises of the town it is interested in and reaps the benefit of getting an increased traffic therefrom.

There are many outlying towns of importance contiguous to Chicago. These also have their merchants and manufacturers who are seeking markets for their wares. Demands will be made upon the railroads which serve these outlying towns for such favorable rates as will enable them to market their products as against Chicago or St. Louis. It may be to the best interest of one or more of the railroads that these demands be complied with. Rival industries and manufacturing cities farther removed, that would be affected in the sale of their products by the favorable rates given the others, would follow in making like demands upon the particular railroads which they support, with the result that relief would at once forthcome.

Then, too, railroads running from other towns situated on the rivers, such as Cairo, Paducah, Evansville, Louisville, and Cincinnati, are obliged to make rates to river points approximating those made by the boats; and inland towns, whose trade may be affected by these, make claims on the railroads which serve them for such an adjustment of their rates as will equalize their disadvantages. Thus the demand would spread step by step, until almost the entire northern country had partaken in a measure of the low rates made necessary in the first instance by the river influence.

Nor is this all, for, taking the converse of the situation described, the rail carriers are confronted with a condition that abridges their power to uphold rates to and from the inland towns of the Southern States fully as much as in the Northern States.

Mobile is situated on the Gulf of Mexico, 149 miles east of the Mississippi River. It has railroads reaching it which have no interest in New Orleans or its commercial growth. Its merchants and manufacturers compete for trade with those of New Orleans at common markets. The representatives of the railroads running from St. Louis to Mobile say: "While we have not the competition of the river to force a reduction of the rates to Mobile, we have the fact before us that New Orleans gets low rates by river and by rail.

It is in this way that specific rate differentials are established between trade centers interested in effecting sales of their products in common territory. By these means industrial enterprises remote from the river are enabled to trade at business centers situated on the river in competition with those on the river; and, further, inland towns remote from the river are enabled to interchange trade between each other at much more favorable rates than the railroads would be justified in making if the river influence did not exist.

These river rates also affect the rail rates east and west, as well as those north and south. Take grain, for instance, from the Missouri River trade center, Kansas City, to New York; the rates that would apply on such traffic would have to approximate the rates from Kansas City to St. Louis plus the low barge rate from St. Louis to New Orleans. This latter was as low as 4 cents per bushel the past year. Whatever rate is made from Kansas City to the Atlantic seaboard must be made also from the Missouri River gateways, such as St. Joseph, Leavenworth, Nebraska City, and Omaha, or else all the grain west of the Missouri River would be funneled through Kansas City.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that if the improvement of the Mississippi River has ever been a local issue, it is no longer a question of locality. It concerns the whole country, and all the people, North and South, East and West, are vitally interested in it. The great States of Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota alone produce 25 per cent of the agricultural products of the United States and contain 19 per cent of its population. Now, add to these all the other States which will be directly benefited by the improvement of the greatest of American rivers, and you will find that nearly half the people of the country and half the amount of the capital invested in the United States are directly or indirectly concerned in it.

In November the people of the Mississippi Valley will hold a great convention at St. Louis to again direct the attention of Congress and the country to this paramount question of internal improvement. They will demand, earnestly and not in uncertain tones, freight regulation by means of river regulation, cheaper transportation for their products to the markets of the world, and a new Government policy which, by the use of our natural advantages, will enhance our commerce and national wealth and benefit the railroads and the people, producers and consumers alike. And I say, let us listen to the people! [Applause.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. For a number of years the sundry civil bill has carried an appropriation for Toledo Harbor. I have looked through the bill and I find that it does not carry an appropriation this year. I want to ask if this is because of the fact that there is deemed to be a sufficient balance already appropriated to last during the coming year?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that the amount authorized is $800,000. The appropriation up to date is $784,500. Of this there is a balance of $15,500 unexpended. The estimate for the fiscal year submitted by the War Department is $15,000. In other words, they have $500 more available than they estimate will be expended during the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. SOUTHARD. What is the total of unexpended balance?

Mr. TAWNEY. Fifteen thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors if those figures correspond with his information?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have not examined the figures for a considerable time. At the close of the last fiscal year there was a balance approximately of $294,000 on hand. There were outstanding contracts amounting to $215,000. To complete the work provided for would require about $15,000 in addition to the $215,000 on outstanding contracts, so that the balance on hand was sufficient, not only to meet the work contracted for, but the balance to be done. It would seem that the project can be completed within the estimate and leave a considerable balance on hand.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at New Haven, Conn.: For completing improvement in accordance with the adopted and extended projects, $64,926.10.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, lines 15 to 18 inclusive. I will state in regard to this paragraph that, according to the language of the report which is before us, a point of order would lie. I read from the Report of the Chief of Engineers, part 1, page 100. After giving a brief summary of all the work to be done in the harbor, the report proceeds to say: "The above project was completed April 26, 1904, mainly under continuing contract, and improvement has been maintained."

According to the statement on the opposite page there is a balance available of $48,000. The reason why this item appears here is one which I may state to the committee, if it is desired, but it would take considerable time. I think, however, both justice to other localities which have been refused appropriations this session under similar circumstances, and lack of opportunity to carefully examine this situation, alike make it desirable that this paragraph should be stricken out.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the paragraph being stricken out. I wish to say, in justice to the committee, that the committee called on the engineers of the War Department to submit detailed statements of the condition of all the appropriations, the progress of the work, when it would be completed, and that statement was sent in in detail. Subsequently this item was sent to the committee with the statement of the War Department that it was authorized, and that it was for the continuation and completion of a work already authorized. The committee without further investigation inserted the item. It was not until after the bill was printed that the gentleman from Ohio called the attention of the committee to the fact, or otherwise it would not have appeared in the bill.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Boston, Mass.: For continuing improvement by providing channels 35 feet deep, and of authorized widths, from the navy-yard at Charlestown and the Chelsea and Charles River bridges to President roads, and thence by route designated as No. 3 through Broad Sound to the ocean, $600,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an appropriation of $600,000 for improvements now being made in Boston Harbor. The river and harbor act of four years ago appropriated $600,000 and authorized an expenditure of $3,000,000 toward the completion of a deep-sea channel there, to be 1,000 feet wide in the upper harbor and 1,200 feet wide in the lower harbor, of a uniform depth of 35 feet. It was expected at that time that all the work would be completed in four years. Based on that authorization there have been appropriations made of $1,470,000. With this proposed appropriation of $600,000 it would make in all $2,070,000. The work is being carried on, as I am informed, under four contracts; and the contracts call for the completion of the work by December 31, 1907. Now, I feared that $600,000 was not a sufficient sum, in view of the fact that it will probably be necessary to appropriate more than one million in the next sundry civil bill if the work is to be completed by the time specified. If $600,000 is not sufficient for carrying on the work expeditiously, I must insist upon an additional amount. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to the policy of the committee with reference to appropriating money for river and harbor improvements that are under the continuing-contract plan. Is it the policy of the committee to appropriate whatever the Chief of Engineers says is necessary?

Mr. TAWNEY. Absolutely.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then this $600,000 appropriated now is all that the Chief of Engineers calls for.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will give the committee the information that we had in making this appropriation. It is as follows:

Improving harbor at Boston, Mass. (35-foot channel).

Limit of expenditure authorized by act of June 13, 1902		$3,000,000.00
Amount appropriated under this authority to date		1,470,000.00
Balance remaining unappropriated		1,530,000.00
Present unexpended balance January 1, 1906		854,738.77
Probable expenditures before June 30, 1906:
For dredging	$255,850.77
For ledge removal	101,488.00
		357,338.77
Probable balance June 30, 1906		497,400.00
Probable expenditures during the year ending June 30, 1907:
Under existing contracts—
Dredging	$856,069.00
Ledge removal	166,331.00
	1,022,400.00
Under proposed contracts, ledge removal	75,000.00
		$1,097,400.00
Amount to be appropriated for year ending June 30, 1907		600,000.00

The work to be carried on under the appropriation asked for is a part of the existing approved project.

Work under contract. Estimate based on probable progress.

That is the information we received, and we accepted it without question and inserted the amount.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, there has been some disappointment expressed that the work has not gone on there more expeditiously, and I wanted to be assured that enough was being appropriated. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Columbia River, Washington: For continuing improvement, in completion of contract authorization, between the mouth of Willamette River and the city of Vancouver, Wash., $13,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee why the appropriation here was made $13,000? The amount authorized by the river and harbor act is $30,000, and I would like to know why it is placed at $13,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. The committee has carried in this bill the exact amount of the engineer's estimate to be expended during the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And that is the amount?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; that is the estimate of the engineers of the War Department who have the work in charge. I will say as to all of these items that the committee has not changed the estimate of the Dpartment in a single instance.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the chairman what significance is in the language "in completion of contract authorization." I notice that in some of these sections the bill authorizes for "continuing improvements," so much money, but in this it says, "for continuing improvement in completion of contract authorization." I notice in the preceding paragraph, with reference to the mouth of the Columbia River, it says "for continuing improvements in completion of contract authorization, $3,000." Now, that is the whole amount.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that that language has been corrected by the amendment which I sent to the desk a moment ago and which was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Illinois and Mississippi Canal: For completing improvement, $200,000.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. If it should appear later that the $200,000 appropriated for completing the Illinois and Mississippi Canal would not be enough to complete that canal, would the Illinois and Mississippi Canal be stopped from asking for any further money by virtue of the language used here in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. The parties in interest would have to proceed then just as they proceeded to obtain the original appropriation, by going to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and securing an increase in authorization..

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Any appropriation, I would state, made in this sundry civil bill not authorized by the river and harbor bill would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. PRINCE. Have you appropriated here in this bill all that was recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. TAWNEY. We have; all that the engineers recommended.

Mr. PRINCE. And all that was recommended by the River and Harbor Committee?

Mr. TAWNEY. Up to the limit of cost. The amount recommended by the engineers to be appropriated for 1907 was $200,000, which amount, as inserted in the bill, is recommended.

Mr. PRINCE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from mouth of Ohio River to Minneapolis, Minn.: For continuing improvement, in completion of contract authorization, from the mouth of the Missouri River to St. Paul, Minn., $300,000.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if there are other purposes for which the sum appropriated in this paragraph can be used than the dredging of the Mississippi River? I assume that it is improvement by dredging to which this language refers.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not quite catch the first part of the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. RHODES. I say I want to know if there are other purposes for which the amount of money carried in this appropriation can be used than the dredging of the Mississippi River. I infer it is dredging to which this language refers.

Mr. TAWNEY. To what item does the gentleman refer? I have not the page.

Mr. RHODES. On page 105, and the language is this:

Improving the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to Minneapolis, Minn.: For continuing improvements in completion of contract authorization from the mouth of the Missouri River to St. Paul, Minn., $300,000.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. If the gentleman will pardon me, there is another question, it seems to me, of more importance than that. Should not this read "from the mouth of the Missouri River to Minneapolis?" The river is divided into three sections for the purpose of appropriation and authorization. One is from the mouth of the Ohio to the Head of the Passes, which is virtually the point at which the Mississippi empties into the Gulf; the second is from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri, and the third is from the mouth of the Missouri to Minneapolis. It seems to me this is an error here.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the gentleman will observe the language in the paragraph is correct. The language he criticises is the title, and the reason that title is carried that way is on account of the method of bookkeeping.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I notice the title is incorrect and the item itself is correct.

Mr. TAWNEY. The item of appropriation is correct.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, that does not cover the point. I want to know if there are other purposes for which this money can be expended than the dredging of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio to Minneapolis?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, is more familiar with the details of this legislation than I am, and he can answer the question, but I will say it can be used only for the purposes specifically provided for in the river and harbor act.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri this item here has no bearing upon the portion of the river in which he is interested. This only applies to the stretch of the river which extends from the mouth of the Missouri upward to Minneapolis; but answering, however, the spirit of his question, or what he is seeking to know, I will state that the river and harbor act of 1905 contemplated a change in the treatment of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri to the mouth of the Ohio. The board of engineers who examined the locality made a report in which they stated that to treat the river by revetment, by hurdles, and by the plan recommended in 1881 would cost $20,000,000 in the first instance and would cost $400,000 per annum to maintain. This seems an enormous cost, and the committee in the bill passed a year ago last winter recommended a change in the method of treatment, under which dredging should bear a larger share and the cost would be very much less. Indeed, the commerce has been falling off steadily, and the amounts appropriated seem unduly large. The question is now before the Comptroller of the Treasury whether, under the language inserted in the bill of 1905, any amount on hand for the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri and the mouth of the Ohio, except the appropriations prior to 1905, which are now, for the most part, exhausted, can be applied for the preservation of the work under the old plan. The Comptroller has not yet given his answer. In the case of a negative answer it is the intention of the committee to consider the subject and perhaps introduce a corrective statute here, to be passed this session, for the reason that while the general plan has been materially changed there is some work yet remaining under the old method which should not be neglected.

Mr. RHODES. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for this explanation. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I desire a very few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, what I desire to say is this: I understand from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio that it is the policy or the present plan to make whatever improvements are necessary on the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and the city of St. Louis by dredging. I am in receipt of a petition signed by a great many citizens residing in three counties in my district bordering on the Mississippi River, and if the facts set out in this petition are true, this plan by which it is proposed to improve the Mississippi River is a gigantic failure.

One of those counties is the county of Ste. Genevieve, in which is situate the city of Ste. Genevieve, the oldest town in the State of Missouri. I know as a matter of fact the boat landing at the city of Ste. Genevieve has long since been destroyed and is now over a mile from the city of Ste. Genevieve. I know also the boat landing at a place called "Cliff Landing," also in Ste. Genevieve County, is practically destroyed on account of certain conditions which need correction. The reason that these conditions exist at these points on the Mississippi River seems to be on account of the great amount of sediment that is being rapidly deposited here and the formation of sand bars, and this plan of dredging has not served the purpose it was intended to serve.

The further fact is, on the Illinois side they have an alluvial shore and on the Missouri side we have a rock shore, and as the current has been deflected from the Missouri side to the Illinois side, the result has been to cut into the Illinois alluvial shore, and also to pile up these immense sand bars, stretching miles and miles on the Missouri shore, which has practically destroyed the boat landings at Cliff Landing and the city of Ste. Genevieve.

I do not know just what should be done, but I do know that something ought be done to prevent this accumulation of sand bars and the destruction of our landings. I desire to read this petition, which is signed by E. E. Swink and numerous other citizens of Ste. Genevieve, St. Francois, and Jefferson counties.

Hon. M. E. RHODES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The undersigned, your constituents, beg leave to call your attention to a grievance which, unless promptly remedied, may lead to very serious consequences affecting their interests and the interests of a large part of the people of Ste. Genevieve County and adjoining counties. The blackprint hereto attached, which is made from original surveys on file in the St. Louis office of the United States Engineer Department, in charge of river improvements, will best illustrate the situation.

Brickeys, or Cliff Landing, situated on the Mississippi River about midway between the city of Ste. Genevieve, Ste. Genevieve County, and Crystal City, in Jefferson County, has been for over sixty years one of the best-known and safest landings on the western bank of the Mississippi River between Cairo and St. Louis. It is used very extensively for shipment by the farmers, merchants, and manufacturers of those counties. The channel of the river originally ran close to the Missouri shore for many miles north and south of that landing, but a bar forming many years ago a few miles above the landing developed into what is now known as "Ames Island," a low sand island, overgrown with willows. After the formation of this island the channel still continued along the eastern edge of it until about 1897 and came to the Missouri shore some distance above Morrison Hollow, shown on the attached map. River men uniformly assert that there never was, even at the lowest stages of the river, less than 20 feet of water in this channel between the place where it struck the Missouri bluff and thence for several miles downward.

About six or seven years ago the channel began to sheer off from the lower point of Ames Island southeastwardly toward the Illinois shore, and the United States engineers, in order to prevent the river from cutting into the alluvial soil on the opposite shore in Illinois, constructed a revetment on its eastern bank at Penitentiary Point, about 2½ miles above Brickeys. This revetment, owing to a failure of appropriations to keep similar structures in thorough repair, was permitted to fall into decay, and the high water of succeeding years tore away the lower end of it, in consequence of which the Mississippi washed away several hundred acres of very valuable land in a high state of cultivation in Randolph County, Ill., and the deep channel shifted to the Illinois shore. What was the bed of the river in and prior to 1900, as the annexed plat will show, is now a sand bar, rapidly extending southwardly and threatening to destroy the landing at Brickeys entirely.

The main channel of the river has shifted so far eastward that it is but a very short distance from a levy constructed by the people of Randolph and Monroe counties, in Illinois, at great expense, and protecting the bottom lands along the river for a distance of 40 miles and more. Should the river seriously cut this levy, as it is now threatening to do, these lands are liable to be inundated to the extent of several hundred thousand acres at every high stage of the river, to the incalculable damage of their owners and inhabitants.

The construction placed by the Attorney-General's office upon the river and harbor appropriation act of 1904–5 confines the United States Engineer's office to an improvement of the river by dredging, and prevented the use of any part of the money appropriated for the preservation of landings, or even for the repair of work that had already been done. The dredging has accomplished very little good, while permitting the protecting structures along the river banks to go to decay has, as the foregoing will show, caused great injury, not only to ancient and well-established landings, but also irreparable injury to people living in the bottom lands adjoining the river.

The United States engineer department in St. Louis replies to repeated complaints made to Major Casey, who is in charge of it, that there is no money available under present appropriations to remedy this state of affairs, which the department concedes is deplorable.

The undersigned therefore earnestly request you to confer without delay with the Hon. W. A. RODENBERG, M. C., whose constituents are vitally interested in this matter, in order to secure either a diversion of part of the appropriation made for dredging in the last river and harbor bills to the protection of the landing at Brickeys, and the incidental protection of hundreds of thousands of acres in the opposite bottoms of Illinois, or else try to secure a separate appropriation for that purpose.

All the facts hereinabove stated can be verified by inquiry of Major Casey.

Respectfully,

Geo. S. Yates, Francis L. Jokust, John Herter, Henry A. Baumann, Frank Rogers, Leon Herman, Walter Koehler, Hy. G. Rehm, John F. Lakose, Joseph H. Vorst, Leo. C. Vorst, Fred A. Sixauer, Jos. Lafumoadure, Chris. Naumann, Oliver C. Naumann, Chas. J. Naumann, Leo. Naumann, Charles W. Meyers, E. E. Swink, F. E. Hinch, H. S. Rehm, D. D. S.; E. H. Sutton, C. E.; John L. Boverie, merchant; Henry J. Cocolise, Edw. B. Morean, W. C. Boverie, Henry G. Klein, Wm. Eichenlaub, James F. Berry, Henry Vaeth F. J. Rigdon, Henry J. Janis, Gottlieb Rehm, J. B. Roberts, G. M. Rutledge.

I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if, in his opinion, there is any part of the unexpended balance of whatever sum was appropriated for the improvement of this part of the Mississippi River in 1905, or by any prior appropriation, that is available for any purpose at this time other than that of dredging?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I will say, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, that under an interpretation put upon the river and harbor act of 1905 by the Judge-Advocate of the War Department there is some doubt as to whether any considerable amount is available for the improvements in his locality. I would say, however, that the committee has had that subject under consideration and has requested a decision from the Comptroller; and if the decision of the Comptroller, as I already stated, is that none of this balance is available we shall seek to bring in legislation. Both the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] have been giving attention to this subject. But in saying that, however, I do not wish the gentleman to indulge the hope for his district that the shifting and eroding banks in that whole stretch of river will be taken care of, but that only such improvements will be made as are immediately required in the interest of navigation.

Mr. RHODES. Referring to the petition just read, you will observe it is stated that Brickeys, or Cliff Landing, which is about midway between Ste. Genevieve and Crystal City, Mo., is one of the best known and safest landings between Cairo and St. Louis, and has been for over sixty years. This is an important landing, because it is used extensively as a shipping point by farmers, merchants, and manufacturers of Ste. Genevieve, St. Francois, and Jefferson counties. The petition further states, as a result of Ames Island having been formed above the landing, the current has been deflected to the Illinois shore, resulting in great damage not only to the Missouri landing, but, as I said before, resulting in great damage to the Illinois side by cutting into and washing away the alluvial banks. As a result of these conditions, I introduced House bill No. 17457 early in the session, which seeks to protect the landing at Brickeys, or Cliff Landing, at Crystal City, and other points on the Mississippi River in Jefferson County, Mo., by appropriating $200,000 for certain improvements at these points. Similar conditions existing at or near the city of Ste. Genevieve and at other points in Ste. Genevieve County prompted me to introduce House bill No. 17351, appropriating $200,000 for specific and needed improvements at those points in Ste. Genevieve County. The fact is the Missouri side consists of a rock shore practically all the way from Crystal City down to the city of Ste. Genevieve, while the Illinois shore consists of an alluvial soil all the way down, which is easily eroded. On our side we have many of those islands, such as Ames Island, all lying close to the Missouri shore, which tend to obstruct our landings and interfere greatly with navigation. I should not only say these islands interfere with navigation, but at some points navigation has been practically destroyed.

But this is not all. The resulting damage is now and has been for years twofold in its nature, viz, the destruction of our Missouri landings and at the same time the washing away of great stretches of the Illinois shore and submerging hundreds of acres of those splendid Illinois bottom lands and destroying hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property. And I here wish to say I trust the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], which seeks to extend the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission in levee improvement, which, if passed, will permit the extension of the levee system north of the mouth of the Ohio and will, in my opinion, materially relieve the situation in my district, will pass. It has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. BURTON] that this particular part of the river has been found difficult to keep in repair, and that perhaps a greater per cent of the total amount of money appropriated for river improvement has been expended on this stretch of the river than on any other equal distance north of the mouth of the Ohio. This is no doubt true, and it will no doubt take a very large sum of money to keep the river in repair between Cairo and St. Louis. However this may be, I take it we must meet the situation as we find it. Two particular unavoidable conditions, in my judgment, contribute to the existing situation, viz, the great amount of sediment which is brought into the Mississippi by the Missouri tends to obstruct the channel of the Mississippi and the inability of the Illinois banks to confine the water within its natural channel on account of the readiness with which the banks erode. The Missouri shore being of a rock formation, we escape injury by erosion and inundation down to Ste. Genevieve, but suffer on account of the current shifting to the opposite shore and the formation of bars and islands near our shores. As I said before, I know something ought to be done, and in my opinion ought to be done quickly. From Ste. Genevieve down to Cape Girardeau the nature of things somewhat change. The rock shore gives way on the Missouri side to low flat bottoms and alluvial banks. The situation in Perry County, Mo., is quite as bad as in the counties of Jefferson and Ste. Genevieve, and with a view to giving relief at Clearyville, Belgique, Crains Island, and other points in this county I introduced H. R. bill No. 17456. This bill provides for river improvement at these points by fencing, revetment, and such other methods as are calculated to protect the banks from erosion and confine the water in its natural channel. The sum which this bill seeks to appropriate for these purposes is also $200,000. I beg to submit a letter from one of the leading citizens of Perry County, Mr. Joseph Fenwick, of Perryville, on this subject, and which is unquestionably well founded in fact, as Mr. Fenwick is a native of the county and knows every foot of the river to which he refers. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

PERRYVILLE, MO., February 1, 1906.

Hon. M. E. RHODES, Washington, D. C.

FRIEND RHODES: Replying to yours in regard to Mississippi River improvement, will say that at Clearyville, opposite Chester, Ill., work is needed to protect bank and keep river from washing away Clearyville. At head of Crains Island, being about where township line between townships 36 and 37 north intersects river, there is urgent need of keeping river from going down old chute by way of Belgique, being place where former appropriations have been spent, but work is now going to pieces, and if neglected will not only make a bad river, but ruin the lower end of Bois Brule Bottom. At what is known as Huber and Sutterer Island, being in township 36 north, range 12 east, the fences have been damaged and should be repaired without fail, thus keeping the river in its channel and protecting the banks as well. Between Red Rock and Seventysix, being in township 35 north, range 13 east, some work should be done to keep channel in place where it now is. Parties along river approve the system of fencing as made by the Government, and ask that they be kept up, which could be done at comparatively small costs if attended to at once.

Very truly, yours, JOS. F. FENWICK.

You will observe it is stated the method of improvement by fencing is approved by the people along the river, and it is desired that this method be continued. Mr. Fenwick also states that the little town of Clearyville is in danger of being washed away and the beautiful Bois Brule Bottom inundated. I know it is urged that it is not the policy of the Government to protect private property from damage by our rivers, and perhaps the Government ought not be expected to protect the interests of the private citizen; yet I take it I can consistently ask that these appropriations be granted on the theory of protecting the river in the interest of navigation. The fact is, it matters not where river improvement is had of this character and under like circumstances, there are always certain benefits which incidentally accrue to the private citizen, though primarily the purpose of the improvement is to protect the river in the interest of navigation. Hence I take it the improvements contemplated in my bills are not in violation of the policy of the Government in carrying on our present system of river improvement. The fact that no river and harbor bill is to be reported until next winter of course makes it impossible for my bills to be acted upon at this session, and as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has kindly agreed to see that the people of my district are to have at least temporary relief we are not only very thankful for this assurance, but shall be satisfied to wait for general relief until the river and harbor bill shall have been made up at the next session of Congress. As I understand the situation from the explanation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the question about which there seems to be some doubt in the minds of officials has recently been referred to the Comptroller for an opinion, and in the event the Comptroller holds any part of the unexpended balance now on hand can not be expended for improvements other than dredging, as provided by the river and harbor act of 1905, certain remedial legislation is contemplated the present session to relieve the situation, particularly at Brickeys, or Cliff Landing, and on the Illinois side. If, however, the Comptroller holds, as we hope he will, that a part of this money can be expended for purposes other than dredging, I certainly hope that every place named in my bills will receive favorable consideration at the hands of the Commission. There is no doubt but such action is warranted. I have gone over the whole situation, not only with the River and Harbor Committee, but with the Committee on Levees and Improvements. Messrs. RODENBERG and SMITH, of Illinois, whose districts are also affected, are equally interested, because their constituents have been injured along with mine and have suffered from the same common causes. I will say further, we took this matter up last winter with the War Department, under whose jurisdiction this part of the river is, and had an inspection made by Major Casey, of St. Louis, at some of those points named in my bills, and I am pleased to say the contention set out in the petition of E. E. Swink et al. is sustained by Major Casey in his report to the Department.

I here wish to have printed in the RECORD some of the correspondence leading up to this inspection by Major Casey, a copy of his report to General Mackenzie, Chief of Engineers, and General Mackenzie's letter to me.

ST. LOUIS, MO., March 17, 1906.

Hon. M. E. RHODES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In conformity with my statement of March 12, plats showing condition at Brickeys are herewith inclosed. I was down there yesterday and find matters getting worse, as the current eats very rapidly into the Illinois shore and destroys a considerable quantity of valuable farming land. Mr. RODENBERG is sick in East St. Louis, and if I can spare the time I will try to see him, and have him seen by some of his constituents before he returns to Washington.

Very truly, yours,

R. E. ROMBAUER.

ST. LOUIS, March 21, 1906.

Hon. M. E. RHODES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your dispatch dated March 20, as follows:

"War Department has instructed Major Casey to inspect river situation at once. See him Wednesday. Letter of explanation by special delivery will reach you Thursday morning."

I have seen Major Casey this morning, and found out that he was in possession of the two petitions sent to you from Ste. Genevieve and St. Francois counties, and of the map showing the situation, which papers were indorsed with instructions from the War Department addressed to him, requesting him to look into the matter at once and report conditions without delay.

Both Major Casey and myself are of opinion that with the present temper of Congress it will be impossible at this late day to get an independent appropriation for improvement of the Mississippi River. There is, however, an unappropriated balance amounting to about $300,000 of the appropriation made by the sundry appropriation bill approved March 3, 1905, of which one-half could be diverted from the object stated therein to the general improvement of the river, which, I think, by proper effort can be done and would meet with the support of Major Casey, which, of course, is important. Major Casey tells me that if this action can be secured he will use a great part of the funds for the purpose of improving the situation at Brickeys.

There are a number of gentlemen, constituents of Mr. RODENBERG, coming up here to-morrow for the purpose of going over with me to see Mr. RODENBERG. I regret that I can not meet them, since I am compelled to leave for Louisville to-night on matters of importance. I will, however, leave specific directions, accompanied by plats and a full statement of the situation, with them, and will authorize people in my office to open your letter and to either read or deliver it to them so that they can make use of it with Mr. RODENBERG and Major Casey.

Very much obliged to you for the zeal displayed in this matter.

Very truly, yours,

R. E. ROMBAUER.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 31, 1906.

Hon. M. E. RHODES,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: 1. Referring to petition from Mr. Ed. Zeller and others, that steps be taken to secure a diversion of a part of the appropriation made in the last river and harbor act for the Mississippi River, to be applied to protection of the landing at Brickeys, otherwise known as Cliff Landing, between Ste. Genevieve and Crystal City, and the protection of Randolph and Monroe counties, Ill., or that a separate appropriation be secured for the purpose, I have the honor to inform you that I am to-day in receipt of a report on the subject from Maj. Thomas L. Casey, Corps of Engineers, the district engineer, of which a copy is inclosed. It will be seen that in Major Casey's opinion it is desirable that the diversion asked or a special appropriation be made for the work.

2. You are undoubtedly aware of the fact that the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1905, altered the adopted project for the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri River by providing that future prosecution of the improvement be by dredging, leaving no funds available for permanent works, except a portion of the balance then remaining on hand to the credit of the improvement. It will therefore require Congressional action to secure such diversion as is the desire of your petitioners, and beyond stating the facts to you, as I have done, it is not in my power to render assistance.

3. The petition is returned herewith.

Very respectfully, A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

MARCH 29, 1906.

Brig. Gen. A. MACKENZIE,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL: 1. In response to instructions contained in the first indorsement, office of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, March 19, 1906, on the letter of Ed. Zeller et al. to the Hon. M. E. RHODES (E. D. file 50524–1), petitioning that steps be taken to secure funds for the protection of the landing on the Mississippi River at Brickey, Mo., and of Randolph and Monroe counties, Ill., I have the honor to make the following report:

2. Examination and survey of the locality were made on March 23 and 24, 1906, the results of which are shown on the accompanying map.

3. Brickey Mill has been for many years a principal shipping point for the citizens of that part of Ste. Genevieve County, Mo., and has been accessible to steamers by reason of the deep-water channel past the landing at all navigable seasons of the year.

4. Much work in bank protection and channel contraction has been done by this office in that vicinity, and the extension of those works and the construction of others were in plan when their execution was interrupted by the terms of the river and harbor act of the last Congress.

5. For several years past the erosion of the right bank along Ames Island and the growing bar below it have caused deflection of the channel to the Illinois shore, which, in turn, has suffered such rapid and destructive erosion below the revetment at Penitentiary Point as to greatly widen the river there and draw the channel permanently away from Brickey, tending to the silting up of the depths that formerly obtained along the Missouri shore and to the ultimate extension downstream of the upper bar, to cover and destroy the landing.

6. The construction of the proposed hurdles at Penitentiary Point, as marked upon the map, No. 1 the first season and No. 2 the second, at an estimated cost of $75,000, would materially correct the excessive width of the river at this place, would cause an erosion of the threatening Missouri bar, would restore the channel to its former location in the vicinity of Brickey, and would virtually extend the bank protection already placed at Penitentiary Point by preventing further erosion of the Illinois bank below it, and thus preserve the important levee at present threatened.

7. As the small balance of funds remaining on hand from former appropriations for works of permanent improvement is not sufficient to warrant the construction of new works, and will probably be soon entirely expended in the repair and maintenance of those already begun, it is respectfully recommended that Congress be urged to grant authority for the use of a portion of the last appropriation for dredging—as one-half of the unallotted and unexpended balance on hand, which would amount to about $85,000—to the construction of these hurdles and such other work in the district as may be similarly urgent and beneficial to the interests of navigation, or else to grant a special appropriation for this work.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. L. CASEY,
Major, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

I submit this correspondence for the purpose of showing how apparent it is that immediate improvements be made at those points named in my bills. I wish to call attention to the maps and plats alluded to in the petition and correspondence. These maps and plats show the present river situation at those points. They show the present location of the channel of the river. They also show the past location of the channel and the shifting of the channel from the Missouri to the Illinois shore at various periods during the last ten years. These maps and plats are copied from the official maps and drawings in the office of the River Commission, and are not only accurately and scientifically drawn, but unquestionably show the exact situation. Mr. Chairman, I shall heed the admonition of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is a well-recognized authority on the subject of waterways and river improvements, viz, that I must not indulge the hope for my district that it is the intention of the committee to recommend that the entire stretch of the river provided for in my bills be taken care of, but only such improvements will be made as are immediately required in the interest of navigation, and, in the name of the good people of my district, I thank him for the information given me from time to time and his assurance that we are to at least have some relief at this session. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I will say, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, that under an interpretation put upon the river and harbor act of 1905 by the Judge-Advocate of the War Department there is some doubt as to whether any considerable amount is available for the improvements in his locality. I would say, however, that the committee has had that subject under consideration and has requested a decision from the Comptroller; and if the decision of the Comptroller, as I already stated, is that none of this balance is available we shall seek to bring in legislation. Both the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] have been giving attention to this subject. But in saying that, however, I do not wish the gentleman to indulge the hope for his district that the shifting and eroding banks in that whole stretch of river will be taken care of, but that only such improvements will be made as are immediately required in the interest of navigation.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TAWNEY], also that of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. BURTON of Ohio] for a few moments. It is difficult for those sitting in the rear of the House to hear what is said by gentlemen speaking farther down the Hall.

Four counties of my district, namely, Alexander, Union, Jackson, and Randolph border on the Mississippi River. In Alexander County a few years ago, when the Mississippi River was about to cut into Cache River that empties into the Ohio above Cairo, I secured an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars to prevent this threatened danger; the work was done under that appropriation and the immediate danger prevented. At Willards Landing, in Union County, much work was done, at my request, to prevent the Mississippi from cutting into a chain of lakes there, which would have destroyed navigation if it had occurred. Other work was done under the general appropriation in certain other places on the Mississippi, but much more is needed. Now, the information which I desire is this: Under this provision which has just been read I see the following:

Improving Mississippi River from mouth of Ohio River to Minneapolis, Minn.: For continuing improvement, in completion of contract authorization, from the mouth of the Missouri River to St. Paul, Minn., $300,000.

Now, while this provision is, as specified, for improving the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio to Minneapolis, yet following that it would seem that the $300,000 appropriated by this provision can only be expended for improvements from the mouth of the Missouri up to St. Paul. Am I correct in that?

Mr. TAWNEY. You are.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. If the gentleman will allow me, I can answer that question. After very careful consideration of the subject a year ago last winter, when the river and harbor bill was passed, it was not thought that any more money was needed between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. It had already been provided for, while the other stretches of the river were not so amply provided for; and this portion of the river, from the mouth of the Missouri to the mouth of the Ohio, was intentionally omitted, so far as any appropriation to be made in this sundry civil bill was concerned. There is no authorization under which the Committee on Appropriations could include any amount in this bill, and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if blame attaches to any committee it is not to the Committee on Appropriations, but to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I trust the gentleman from Ohio has not understood that I was offering any criticism. I was asking a question for information. Now, one other question to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. As I understand it, under the last river and harbor appropriation bill the remainder of the money remaining under that appropriation can not be expended on work from the mouth of the Ohio up the Mississippi, for any purpose other than dredging. I was unable to catch the gentleman's reply to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. As that question has several times been asked, I think it is best to read the provisions of the act, found on page 27 of the river and harbor appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1905:

> Improving the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to and including the mouth of the Missouri River: The Secretary of War may prosecute the improvement of the said section of the Mississippi River by dredging, as set forth in the report of the Board of Engineers for rivers and harbors, submitted November 12, 1903; and the said Secretary of War may purchase or cause to be constructed two dredges, to be employed with those now in use in said section for the purpose of dredging.

Thus money may be expended at any point, under the new method.

Then follows this:

> And the said Secretary may, in his discretion, expend a portion of the balance now remaining on hand to the credit of said improvement for the completion of works already under way or for the construction of other works which will be useful in promoting the navigation of said section of the river; and such balance as remains on hand, together with the amount authorized to be expended in pursuance of contracts to be made, is hereby made available for the purposes set forth in this item.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. That does not contemplate any other character of work, except dredging.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois may be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I thank the gentleman and the House for the courtesy, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio to continue his explanation.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. At the time the bill was debated there was an ample balance on hand for the maintenance of these hurdles and all the old forms of improvement, and the committee regarded it as a mere matter of bookkeeping whether the money expended be deducted from the balance on hand or from the amount appropriated on the same day, $650,000, for further prosecution of the work.

A question has been raised in the Department, however, whether the maintenance of the old régime or method is not merely a charge against the balance which they had on hand, which, by their method of bookkeeping, they have exhausted or very nearly so. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the question is now before the Department.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I was going to ask this additional question. I understood from information coming to me day before yesterday, from the Chief Engineer's Office, that the question had been raised whether or not the balance of the money remaining on hand, considering the language of the provision of the last river and harbor bill, might be expended wherever necessary, and in any manner other than for dredging purposes, and that up to that time the Comptroller had not rendered a decision.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. He had not rendered a decision in regard to the $650,000 appropriated March 3, 1905, but very clearly the balance remaining over from previous appropriations was available for the purposes mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois. The difficulty about utilizing that amount for any extended improvement, however, is that the balance of it now on hand is very small.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for the information. I was inquiring for that purpose, because in endeavoring to look after the interests of the river and of the people within my district, I am satisfied, from my personal knowledge, that there is great necessity for much more work to be done at the points mentioned by me and several other points on the Mississippi within my district. I know that to be a fact. But the question with me was whether or not there were any funds available with which the work could be done; but as it does not appear from the statement of the gentleman that there are sufficient funds for the work I have indicated, I sincerely hope that in the near future his committee may make ample appropriations to do the needed work along that stretch of the Mississippi River first mentioned by me, as any effort to secure same on this bill would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend by adding after the last word of the paragraph the following: "For improving Missouri River from St. Joseph, Mo., to its mouth, the sum of $500,000."

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is a river and harbor appropriation.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order for a minute?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I am willing to reserve it for a moment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I apprehended that as soon as the Missouri River was mentioned it might possibly arouse feelings of hostility on that side of the House. It is a little strange, too. That river is a great stream. It flows through a great, rich, fertile country. Of course, I take it that the greatest State through which it runs or whose shores it washes is, perhaps, the State of Missouri. That great State of Missouri, hoping to cultivate a friendly feeling with gentlemen on that side of the House, began flirting with the party in power two years ago. We even divided our delegation, sending, I believe, nine Republicans and seven Democrats, in the hope that we might reach the hearts of gentlemen on that side and get them to be considerate of our reasonable demands for this river.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] if the Federal Government will not help us, what are we going to do with that river? I say to you, there is not a river in the United States that needs improvement as badly as the Missouri River. It is an incorrigible stream. It ignores the boundaries fixed by nature, washes over them, often leaves its channel and forms a new one, and raises thunder generally; and we ask the assistance of the strong arm of the United States Government to come and help us control this fitful, fickle——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Rambunctious!

Mr. RUCKER. And, as my friend from Tennessee says, rambunctious river that we can not control by State law. Will you not help us? Let this little appropriation go through, and then our people will not so much regret what they did to swell the overwhelming Republican majority here, which I hope will give me a unanimous vote on this just, reasonable, and meritorious amendment.

Mr. RHODES. I wish to thank my colleague for the assistance that he gave to the Republican party in the last campaign. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. We did it in the hope that it would have some good effect here, but we serve notice now that unless this amendment goes through, we intend to send a fifteen to one delegation here next time—fifteen Democrats to one Republican. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did you do it on purpose?

Mr. RUCKER. We did it designedly, hoping thereby to secure some consideration from the Republican majority in this House. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio make the point of order?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is clearly subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, because there is no authorization for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio that there is no authorization for it?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. None whatever.

Mr. RUCKER. We tried awful hard to get one, but the gentleman from Ohio overlooked it in his other bill, and I hope he will not make the point of order here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will say that we have had so many interesting discussions upon the Missouri River that it would be unprofitable now to continue them on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RUCKER. I sincerely hoped that the gentleman from Ohio would confess that it was due to an oversight that the Missouri River was left out.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would say further that a careful examination convinced the committee that there was some navigation in days before this expensive treatment was begun; that in the olden days it was used for boats, but when we began to spend millions upon it navigation ceased. After mature deliberation it seemed best to go back to the old days of no appropriation in hopes that navigation might again be resumed. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, the gentleman is too good a lawyer and too good logician to make that plea. You give us what we ask and I will guarantee that we will again have navigation on the Missouri River that will give satisfaction to our people, at least. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing improvement, in completion of contract authorization, of Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries and clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission, $2,000,000.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, with a view of making some inquiry. Recently there has been passed and approved by the President a bill extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission 50 miles north of the Ohio River to a point called "Cape Girardeau." I wish the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee would give me his impression as to whether this appropriation of $2,000,000 could be used under the law for improving the levee system from the Ohio River to Cape Girardeau, where they have extended the Commission.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, of course nothing I might say ought to be accepted as expressing the probable decision of the officials of the executive department, because that responsibility rests with them. I am satisfied of one thing, however, which answers the gentleman's question indirectly, namely, that there is no need of amending this provision here, because the statute already passed this session is perfectly plain and distinct. It reads:

Any funds which have been or may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for improving the Mississippi River between the Head of the Passes and the mouth of the Ohio River—and which may be allotted to levees may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for levees upon any part of said river between the Head of the Passes and Cape Girardeau, Mo.

That is in accordance with this provision here—

That in so many words includes this portion of the river between the mouth of the Ohio and Cape Girardeau in that part from the Ohio down to the Passes. It consolidates the two.

It should be noticed, however, that the statute reads, and it must so read in the very nature of the case, "for continuing improvement in completion of contract authorization." That probably means that the greater share of this $2,000,000 made available under this appropriation has been contracted to be expended already—that is, they have already provided for construction of levees that will exhaust the most of this amount.

Then there is another fact, that before any levees are contracted for by the Mississippi River Commission it is customary to make surveys, also consultations are had with the people of the locality, agreements are generally made under which those owning the abutting property upon the stretch of the river under consideration agree to pay a share—one-half, usually. It would be necessary that all these preliminary steps should be taken before any contracts for levees are made. So, to sum up the whole matter, it is not clear, I may say not probable, that any considerable share of the amount appropriated by this bill would be expended for levees above the mouth of the Ohio; but so far as legislation can consolidate the two portions and provide for expenditure there in the future, the bill reported from the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, with this bill, accomplishes everything that could be done.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a further question. Is there a lump-sum appropriated for the purpose of making surveys?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. For the Mississippi River there is an allotment by the Commission. It is not separately appropriated. The two millions is appropriated for the Mississippi River below the Ohio, which under the recent law would include that portion of the river from the mouth of the Ohio to Cape Girardeau, at least so far as expenditure for levees is concerned. The members of the Commission make an allotment, so much for surveys, so much for levees, etc. The amount for levees is usually more than half.

Mr. PRINCE. The question I wanted more definitely answered was this: The gentleman intimated that inasmuch as there had not been any survey of the river for levee purposes between the mouth of the Ohio River and Cape Girardeau, to which this law extended the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, and in view of the further fact that no contracts, they heretofore having no jurisdiction of it, have been made, therefore this one million or no part of it could be used toward levee work from the mouth of the river up to Cape Girardeau——

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. All or most of the amount for levees is probably already allotted to localities below the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. PRINCE. Is there any way aside from legislation that the river commission can make a survey out of money now appropriated?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Oh, yes, indeed. They can allot money. It does not require any legislation. There is no question about that.

Mr. PRINCE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

REGULATING DELIVERY, ETC., OF SPONGES.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (S. 4806) to regulate the landing, delivery, cure, and sale of sponges, together with a statement of the conferees for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

ELIZA SWORDS.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 1160) granting an increase of pension to Eliza Swords, together with a statement of the conferees thereon, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed under the rule.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 166. Joint resolution providing for payment for dredging the channel and anchorage basin between Ship Island Harbor and Gulfport, Miss., and for other purposes;

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 11, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL, D. D., of the city of New York.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN CHINA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, reports on the trade conditions in China by Special Agents Harry R. Burrill and Raymond S. Crist; which, with the accompanying reports, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN JAPAN AND KOREA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, reports on trade conditions in Japan and Korea by Special Agent Raymond S. Crist; which, with the accompanying reports, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Hon. William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, appointed by the governor of that State successor to the late Senator Gorman for his unexpired term and until the meeting of the next general assembly of Maryland. I ask that the credentials be read, and that Mr. Whyte be qualified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials of William Pinkney Whyte, appointed by the governor of the State of Maryland a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the legislature thereof, the vacancy occasioned by the death of Arthur Pue Gorman in the term ending March 3, 1909, were read and ordered to be filed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator appointed will appear at the Vice-President's desk and take the oath of office.

Mr. Whyte was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. RAYNER; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 19144) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Louisa Sheppard; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18024) for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURTON, Mr. BISHOP, and Mr. LESTER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. ZENOR managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

H. R. 3005. An act granting an increase of pension to Jacob C. Shafer;

H. R. 10395. An act granting an increase of pension to Stephen Cundiff;

H. R. 13828. An act granting an increase of pension to John M. Carroll;

H. R. 14604. An act forbidding the importation, exportation, or carriage in interstate commerce of falsely or spuriously stamped articles of merchandise made of gold or silver or their alloys, and for other purposes;

H. R. 15692. An act granting a pension to Frank M. Dooley;

H. R. 16878. An act granting an increase of pension to James B. Adams;

H. R. 16946. An act releasing the right, title, and interest of the United States to the piece or parcel of land known as the "Cuartel lot" to the city of Monterey, Cal.;

H. R. 18116. An act granting an increase of pension to Green Evans;

H. R. 18135. An act granting an increase of pension to Benedict Sutter;

H. R. 18561. An act granting an increase of pension to Jonathan Skeans;

H. J. Res. 118. Joint resolution accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and including the same, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park, and changing the boundaries thereof;

H. J. Res. 162. Joint resolution authorizing the construction and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures in Lake Michigan adjoining certain lands in Lake County, Ind.;

H. J. Res. 166. Joint resolution providing for payment for dredging the channel and anchorage basin between Ship Island Harbor and Gulfport, Miss., and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 170. Joint resolution to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Evanston, Ill., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the District of Columbia, praying for an investigation into the existing conditions in the Kongo Free State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Illinois State Dental Society, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the establishment of a corps of dental surgeons in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FORAKER. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. DICK], who is unavoidably absent in the discharge of duties elsewhere, I present memorials of sundry railroad employees of Middleport, Cleveland, Youngstown, Zanesville, Ashtabula, Tiffin, Medina, Dennison, and Painesville, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families. I move that the memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. PROCTOR], who is necessarily absent, I present memorials of sundry railroad employees of Windsor, Newport, Harwick, Rutland, and Bellows Falls, all in the State of Vermont, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families. I move that the memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of the Chester Clearing House, of Chester, Pa., and a petition of the Clearing House Association of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation permitting national banks to loan 10 per cent of their capital and surplus to an individual borrower; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Union City Chair Company, of Union City, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to impose a stamp tax of 25 per cent ad valorem on all goods made or partly made in prisons and sold in competition with the product of free labor; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DRYDEN presented the petition of R. J. Caldwell, of New York City, N. Y., praying for the adoption of the so-called "Beveridge meat-inspection amendment" to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Newark, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called "Philippine tariff bill;" which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. BEVERIDGE presented a memorial of Local Division No. 373, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Trenton, N. J., and a memorial of New Jersey Division, No. 294, Order of Railway Conductors, of Trenton, N. J., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Michigan City, Seymour, Indianapolis, Ashley, Janesville, Peru, Elkhart, Bedford, Jefferson, Lafayette, Huntington, Evansville, Logansport, Washington, Tipton, Garrett, Vincennes, and Richmond, all in the State of Indiana, and of Pittsburg, Pa., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

SENATOR FROM UTAH.

Mr. BURROWS. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I submit a report with an accompanying resolution. I ask that the resolution be read and placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution reported by the Senator from Michigan from the Committee on Privileges and Elections will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That REED SMOOT is not entitled to a seat as a Senator of the United States from the State of Utah.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask that the resolution be placed on the Calendar, and I also ask that the hearings in the case be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar. The Senator from Michigan requests that the testimony taken at the hearings in this matter be printed as a document. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. I also ask that 10,000 copies of the report and the views of the minority which are to be presented be printed, 3,000 for the use of the committee, and the balance for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan requests that 10,000 copies of the report of the committee with the views of the minority be printed, 3,000 for the use of the committee, and the residue for the use of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand that the request of the Senator is that the majority and the minority reports shall be printed as one document.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest that they be printed as separate documents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Michigan, that 10,000 copies of the reports be printed as separate documents? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. On behalf of a minority of the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who dissented from the resolution reported by the majority, I submit a report as their views, and ask that it may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio submits a minority report on the same subject.

Mr. FORAKER. May I inquire, will these reports be printed, without an order, in the RECORD? They are somewhat extended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will not.

Mr. FORAKER. I think all Senators will want to see them, and I request that they may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the reports just made be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope there will be no objection to that request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The reports are as follows:

[Senate Report No. 4253, part 1, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were charged by the Senate with the duty of investigating the right and title of REED SMOOT to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Utah, respectfully submit the following report:

On the 23d day of February, 1903, the credentials of REED SMOOT as a Senator of the United States from the State of Utah were presented to the Senate. On the same day and at the same hour there was also presented and placed on file a protest from certain citizens of Utah, praying for an investigation into the right of Mr. SMOOT to the seat to which he claimed to have been elected.

Subsequently, and on the 5th day of March, 1903, Mr. SMOOT took the oath of office as Senator from Utah. At the same time the attention of the Senate was, in behalf of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, called to the method of procedure in cases like that of Mr. SMOOT. It was then stated, without question on the part of any member of the Senate, that in cases where the credentials of a Senator consist of "a certificate of his due election from the executive of his State, he is entitled to be sworn in, and that all questions relating to his qualifications should be postponed and acted upon by the Senate afterwards." Under this rule the credentials of Mr. SMOOT, with the protest against his right to a seat in the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections under a resolution adopted by the Senate January 27, 1904, directing the committee to investigate the right and title of Mr. SMOOT to a seat in the Senate as Senator from the State of Utah.

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate the right and title of REED SMOOT to a seat in the Senate as Senator from the State of Utah; and said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expense of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee."

THE PROTEST AGAINST THE SEATING OF MR. SMOOT.

The protest before referred to against the seating of Mr. SMOOT as a Senator from the State of Utah is stated in such protest to be "upon the ground and for the reason that he is one of a self-perpetuating body of fifteen men who, constituting the ruling authorities of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or 'Mormon Church,' claim, and by their followers are accorded the right to claim, supreme authority, divinely sanctioned, to shape the belief and control the conduct of those under them in all matters whatsoever, civil and religious, temporal and spiritual, and who thus uniting in themselves authority in church and state do so exercise the same as to inculcate and encourage a belief in polygamy and polygamous cohabitation; who countenance and connive at violations of the State law prohibiting the same, regardless of pledges made for the purpose of obtaining statehood and of covenants made with the people of the United States, and who by all the means in their power protect and honor those who, with themselves, violate the laws of the land and are guilty of practices destructive of the family and of the home."

In support of this protest the protestants make certain charges and assertions, the substance of which is as follows:

1. The Mormon priesthood, according to the doctrines of that church, is vested with supreme authority in all things spiritual and temporal.

2. The first presidency and twelve apostles (said REED SMOOT being one of said twelve apostles) are supreme in the exercise of the authority of the Mormon Church in all things temporal and spiritual. In support of this second proposition instances are given of the interference of the first presidency and twelve apostles in the political affairs of the State of Utah, and quotations at length are given from the declarations of officials in the Mormon Church regarding the authority of the leaders in said church to dictate to the membership thereof concerning the political action of said members.

3 and 4. That the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church have not abandoned the principles and practice of political dictation; neither have they abandoned their belief in polygamy and polygamous cohabitation.

5. That the first presidency and twelve apostles (of whom REED SMOOT is one) also practice or connive at and encourage the practice of polygamy, and have without protest or objection permitted those who held legislative offices by their will and consent to attempt to nullify enactments against polygamous cohabitation.

6. That the supreme authorities of the Mormon Church, namely, the first presidency and twelve apostles (of whom Mr. SMOOT is one), not only connive at violations of the law against polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, but protect and honor the violators of such laws.

The protest further asserts that the leaders of the Mormon Church (of whom Mr. SMOOT is one) are solemnly banded together against the people of the United States in the endeavor of said leaders to baffle the designs and frustrate the attempts of the Government to eradicate polygamy and polygamous cohabitation.

The protest further charges that the conduct and practices of the first presidency and twelve apostles (of whom Mr. SMOOT is one) are well known to be, first, contrary to the public sentiment of the civilized world; second, contrary to express pledges which were given by the leaders of the Mormon Church in procuring amnesty; third, contrary to the express conditions upon which the escheated property of the Mormon Church was returned; fourth, contrary to the pledges given by the representatives of that church in their plea for statehood; fifth, contrary to the pledges required in the enabling act and given in the State constitution of Utah; sixth, contrary to a provision in the constitution of Utah providing that "there shall be no union of church and state, nor shall any church dominate the State or interfere with its functions," and seventh, contrary to law. The protest concludes by asking that the Senate make inquiry touching the matters stated in said protest.

This protest is followed by certain charges made by one John L. Leilich under oath, which are in the main of the same tenor and effect as the charges made in the protest, with the additional charge that Mr. SMOOT is a polygamist, having a legal wife and a plural wife, and the further charge that Mr. SMOOT has, as an apostle of the Mormon Church, taken an oath "of such a nature and character as that he is thereby disqualified from taking the oath of office required of a United States Senator."

ANSWER OF MR. SMOOT.

To the statements made in the protest and the charges by Mr. Leilich Mr. SMOOT made answer, which answer is in the nature of a demurrer to all the charges contained in the protest and to the charges made by Mr. Leilich, except two, namely, that Mr. SMOOT is a polygamist and that he is bound by some oath or obligation which is inconsistent with the oath taken by him as a Senator. Both these charges he denies, and further denies, specifically and categorically, the charges made in the protest and by Mr. Leilich.

AUTHORITY OF THE SENATE AND NATURE OF THE INVESTIGATION.

Before proceeding to an examination of the protest and answer and the testimony taken by the committee, it may be well to examine, briefly, the authority of the Senate in the premises and the nature and scope of the investigation.

The Constitution provides (art. 1, sec. 5, par. 1) that "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." It is now well established by the decisions of the Senate in a number of cases that, in order to be a fit representative of a sovereign State of the Union in the Senate of the United States, one must be in all respects obedient to the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State from which he comes, and must also be desirous of the welfare of his country and in hearty accord and sympathy with its Government and institutions. If he does not possess these qualifications, if his conduct has been such as to be prejudicial to the welfare of society, of the nation, or its Government, he is regarded as being unfit to perform the important and confidential duties of a Senator, and may be deprived of a seat in the Senate, although he may have done no act of which a court of justice could take cognizance. Thus William Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, was, in the year 1797, deprived of his seat in the Senate for conduct "inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator." His offense consisted in the writing of a letter to one Carey, an official interpreter to the Cherokee Nation, the conduct of Mr. Blount in writing said letter being characterized by the committee of investigation in that case as follows:

"The plan hinted at in this extraordinary letter to be executed under the auspices of the British is so capable of different constructions and conjectures that your committee at present forbear giving any decided opinion respecting it, except that to Mr. Blount's own mind it appeared to be inconsistent with the interests of the United States and of Spain, and he was therefore anxious to conceal it from both. But when they consider his attempts to seduce Carey from his duty as a faithful interpreter and to employ him as an engine to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public officers of the United States residing among them; the measures he has proposed to excite a temper which must produce the recall or expulsion of our superintendent from the Creek Nation; his insidious advice tending to the advancement of his own popularity and consequence, at the expense and hazard of the good opinion which the Indians entertain of this Government and of the treaties subsisting between us and them, your committee have no doubt that Mr. Blount's conduct has been inconsistent with his public duty, renders him unworthy of a further continuance of his present public trust in this body, and amounts to a high misdemeanor."

The vote on the expulsion of Mr. Blount resulted as follows: Yeas, 25, nays, 1. (Senate Election Cases, 3d ed., pp. 929–933.)

In the year 1807, John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, was accused of being associated with Aaron Burr in a conspiracy "against the peace and prosperity" of the United States. In the report of the committee—of which John Quincy Adams was chairman—appointed to investigate the case the committee say:

"In examining the question whether these forms of judicial proceedings or the rules of judicial evidence ought to be applied to the exercise of that censorial authority which the Senate of the United States possesses over the conduct of its members, let us assume as the test of their application either the dictates of unfettered reason, the letter and spirit of the Constitution, or precedents, domestic or foreign, and your committee believe that the result will be the same—that the power of expelling a member must, in its nature, be discretionary, and in its exercise always more summary than the tardy process of judicial tribunals.

"The power of expelling a member for misconduct results on the principles of common sense, from the interest of the nation that the high trust of legislation should be invested in pure hands. When the trust is elective it is not to be presumed that the constituent body will commit the deposit to the keeping of worthless characters. But when a man whom his fellow-citizens have honored with their confidence on the pledge of his spotless reputation has degraded himself by commission of infamous crimes, which become suddenly and unexpectedly revealed to the world, defective indeed would be that institution which should be impotent to discard from its bosom the contagion of such a member, which should have no remedy of amputation to apply until the poison had reached the heart.

"The question upon the trial of a criminal cause before the courts of common law is not between guilt and innocence, but between guilt and the possibility of innocence. If a doubt can possibly be raised, either by the ingenuity of the party or of his counsel, or by the operation of general rules in their unforeseen application to particular cases, that doubt must be decisive for acquital, and the verdict of not guilty perhaps in nine cases out of ten means no more than that the guilt of the party has not been demonstrated in the precise, specific, and narrow forms prescribed by law. The humane spirit of the laws multiplies the barriers for the protection of innocence and freely admits that these barriers may be abused for the shelter of guilt. It avows a strong partiality favorable to the person upon trial and acknowledges the preference that ten guilty should escape rather than that one innocent should suffer. The interest of the public that a particular crime should be punished is but as one to ten compared with the interest of the party that innocence should be spared. Acquittal only restores the party to the common rights of every other citizen; it restores him to no public trust; it invests him with no public confidence; it substitutes the sentence of mercy for the doom of justice, and to the eyes of impartial reason in the great majority of cases must be considered rather as a pardon than a justification.

"But when a member of a legislative body lies under the imputation of aggravated offenses and the determination upon his cause can operate only to remove him from a station of extensive powers and important trust, this disproportion between the interest of the public and the interest of the individual disappears; if any disproportion exists, it is of an opposite kind. It is not better that ten traitors should be members of this Senate than that one innocent man should suffer expulsion. In either case, no doubt, the evil would be great. But in the former it would strike at the vitals of the nations; in the latter it might, though deeply to be lamented, only be the calamity of an individual."

The resolution reported by the said committee declaring "That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, by his participation in the conspiracy of Aaron Burr against the peace, union, and liberties of the people of the United States, has been guilty of conduct incompatible with his duty and station as a Senator of the United States, and that he be therefore, and hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States," received nineteen affirmative votes to ten in the negative. (Senate Election Cases, 3d ed., pp. 934–948.)

In 1862 Jesse D. Bright was expelled from the Senate for writing a letter to Jefferson Davis, "president of the Confederation of States," in March, 1861, introducing one Thomas B. Lincoln, who wished to dispose of an improvement in firearms. Some at least of the Senators who voted for Mr. Bright's expulsion asserted in effect that they did not claim that Mr. Bright had been guilty of treason, misprision of treason, or any other offense against the laws of this country. He was deprived of his seat in the Senate because it was believed that his desires and conduct were opposed to the welfare and interests of the nation.

In the course of the debate upon the question of expelling Mr. Bright Mr. Sumner used the following language:

"* * * But the question may be properly asked if this inquiry is to be conducted as in a court of justice, under all the restrictions and technical rules of judicial proceedings? Clearly not. Under the Constitution the Senate, in a case like the present, is the absolute judge, free to exercise its power according to its own enlightened discretion. It may justly declare a Senator unworthy of a seat in this body on evidence defective in form, or on evidence even which does not constitute positive crime. * * * It is obvious that the Senate may act on any evidence which shall be satisfactory to show that one of its members is unworthy of his seat without bringing it to the test of any rules of law. It is true that the good name of the individual is in question; but so also is the good name of the Senate, not forgetting also the welfare of the country; and if there are generous presumptions of personal innocence, so also are there irresistible instincts of self-defense which compel us to act vigorously, not only to preserve the good name of the Senate, but also to preserve the country." (Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 37th Cong., pt. 1, pp. 412, 413, 414.)

In the same debate Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, said:

"* * * But what is the law? We are not sitting as a court trying the honorable Senator. There are some gentlemen, able men, very able men, men of enlarged patriotism, of eminent public and private virtue that have pursued the profession of the law so long, either as practitioners, counselors and solicitors, or as judges, that their minds have become too contracted for enlarged statesmanship and the great principles of policy and moral justice, upon which governments ought to be administered, and upon which alone they can be wisely administered. They have dwarfed their minds to such an extent that they can not reason upon the expansive principle and sentiment and consideration that ought to guide and control the largest and wisest statesmanship.

"There is no law which defines any particular class of offenses that shall be sufficient to expel a Senator from his seat. The common law does not. There is no statute law that does. There are no rules of evidence establishing technical rules of testimony that are to guide and control and govern this body in getting its lights and reaching its conclusions when a Senator is thus on trial. The general rule and principle of law and of reason and common sense is that whatever disqualifies a member of the Senate from the proper discharge of his duties, whatever it may be, is sufficient, and ought to be held sufficient, for his expulsion, and whatever evidence satisfies the mind reasonably and according to moral certainty and truth of the existence of that cause is sufficient evidence without resorting to the technical rules of testimony upon which to convict him. That is the law of this country. It is the law of England. It is the law of Parliament. I will read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, section 836, a short paragraph:

"'* * * In July, 1797, William Blount was expelled from the Senate for a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator. The offense charged against him was an attempt to seduce an American agent among the Indians from his duty and to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public authorities of the United States, and a negotiation for services in behalf of the British Government among the Indians. It was not a statutable offense; nor was it committed in his official character; nor was it committed during the session of Congress, nor at the seat of government. Yet, by an almost unanimous vote [25 yeas to 1 nay] he was expelled from that body and he was afterwards impeached (as has already been stated) for this, among other charges. It seems, therefore, to be settled by the Senate, upon full deliberation, that expulsion may be for any misdemeanor which, though not punished by any statute, is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Senator.'

"There is the touchstone. Any conduct, any opinions, any line of action as a Senator which is inconsistent with the duty of a Senator, is a sufficient cause for his expulsion and ought to be the rule of reason and of common sense. * * * The principle deduced from the authorities is this: There is no common law, no statutory law, there is no parliamentary law that binds the Senate to any particular definition of crime or offense in acting in this or any other case of the kind. On the contrary, as these authorities establish, it is a matter coming within the discretion of the tribunal trying the Senator." (Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 37th Cong., pt. 1, pp. 434, 435.)

In the progress of the debate Mr. McDougall said:

"* * * It is no question of law. We have not asked whether the Senator from Indiana is guilty or not guilty. We have to judge him in our best judgment, and by that we try him; and we say yea or nay, as we think, whether he be a true man or not to sit in the Federal councils to conduct the affairs of the United States." (Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 37th Cong., pt. 1, p. 655.)

To the same effect were the remarks made in the course of the same debate by Mr. Lane, Mr. Howe, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Browning. (Congressional Globe, 2d sess. 37th Cong., pt. 1, pp. 417, 418, 560, 584, 623, 624.)

In the year 1867 Philip F. Thomas was denied a seat in the Senate of the United States, to which he had been duly elected, for the reason that he had resigned his seat in the Cabinet of President Buchanan on account of his disagreement with the policy of the President in endeavoring to relieve the garrison of the forts in Charleston Harbor, and also because Mr. Thomas had given to his son, who was about to enter the service of the Confederate States, a sum of money, not to assist the son in going to the camp of the Confederate forces, but "that in case he was imprisoned or suffering he might have a sum of money with him." There was no well-founded claim that Mr. Thomas had been guilty of any act or conduct of which any court would take cognizance; the most that was claimed was that his conduct was such as to give "aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States." (Senate Election Cases, 3d ed., pp. 333–339.)

In the British Parliament the same principle has been recognized in a number of cases and is now fully established.

In the year 1812 Benjamin Walsh was expelled from the House of Commons as "unworthy and unfit to continue a member of this House," on account of said Walsh having been guilty of "gross fraud and notorious breach of trust," although his offense was one "not amounting to felony." (67 Commons Journal, 175–176.) In that case the chancellor of the exchequer said:

"He could not think that because an act of Parliament did not make a moral crime a legal one the House of Commons should be prevented from taking cognizance of it." (Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, first series, vol. 21, p. 1199.)

In the year 1814 Sir Thomas Cochrane was expelled from the House of Commons for being concerned in a conspiracy to spread the false report that the French army had been defeated, Napolean killed, and that the allied sovereigns were in Paris, the object to be attained by such false report being "to occasion a temporary rise and increase in the prices of the public Government funds," to the injury of those who should purchase such funds "during such last-mentioned temporary rise and increase in the prices thereof." (69 Commons Journal, 427–433.)

THE PROTESTANTS.

The main protest in this case was signed by eighteen reputable citizens of the State of Utah. One of the signers, Dr. W. M. Paden, is the pastor of one of the leading Protestant churches of Salt Lake City and a graduate of Princeton University; another, Mr. P. L. Williams, is the general counsel of a railroad in Utah and the Western States; another, Mr. E. W. Wilson, is the cashier of a national bank in Salt Lake City; another, Mr. C. C. Goodwin, the editor of one of the leading papers of that city; another, Mr. W. S. Neldin, the president of a wholesale drug company doing business not only in Utah, but in other of the Western States; another, Mr. Ezra Thompson, a gentleman who has held the office of mayor of Salt Lake City for two terms; another, Mr. J. J. Corwin, a man engaged in real estate, who has been a resident of Utah for about sixteen years; five others, Mr. George R. Hancock, Mr. W. M. Ferry, Mr. Harry C. Hill, Hon. C. E. Allen, and Mr. H. G. McMillan, are men holding positions in the mining industry of Utah. Mr. Allen was the first Representative in Congress from the State of Utah. Another of the signers of the protest, Mr. G. H. Lewis, was formerly assistant United States attorney and is now master in chancery of the United States circuit court. Rev. Abiel Leonard was, up to the time of his death, which occurred in November, 1903, the bishop of the diocese of Utah of the Protestant Episcopal Church. From the standing and character of the signers, it is evident that the protest is not the offspring of suspicion or prejudice, but that such protest emanates from men of such character and respectability as to be entitled to serious and careful consideration and the facts therein stated to be worthy of investigation by the Senate.

As regards the charge that Mr. SMOOT has a plural wife, this fact, if proved, is conceded by Mr. SMOOT and his counsel to be sufficient to disqualify him from holding a seat in the Senate. But this accusation seems to have been made by Mr. Leilich, unadvisedly and on his own responsibility, and without any sufficient evidence in support of the same. This charge is not made in the main protest, and counsel for the protestants at the outset of the investigation very frankly admitted that they had no proof to offer in support of this allegation.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF POLYGAMY AND POLYGAMOUS COHABITATION BY THE MORMON AUTHORITIES.

The first reason assigned by the protestants why Mr. SMOOT is not entitled to a seat in the Senate is, in effect, that he belongs to a self-perpetuating body of fifteen men who constitute the ruling authorities of the Church of Latter-Day Saints, or "Mormon Church," so called; that this ruling body of the church both claims and exercises the right of shaping the belief and controlling the conduct of the members of that church in all matters whatsoever, civil and religious, temporal and spiritual. It is then alleged that this self-perpetuating body of fifteen men, of whom Mr. SMOOT is one, uniting in themselves authority in both church and state, so exercise this authority as to encourage a belief in polygamy as a divine institution and by both precept and example encourage among their followers the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation.

That the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church are a self-perpetuating body of fifteen men seems to be well established by the testimony of the one most competent to speak upon that subject, the president of the Church of Latter-Day Saints, Mr. Joseph F. Smith, who testifies, as will be seen on pages 91 and 92 of volume 1 of the printed copy of the proceedings in the investigation, that vacancies occurring in the number of the twelve apostles are filled by the apostles themselves, with the consent and approval of the first presidency.

The testimony of Mr. Smith is as follows:

"Senator MCCOMAS. And the twelve apostles were then first named?

"Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

"Senator MCCOMAS. When vacancies occurred thereafter, by what body were the vacancies in the twelve apostles filled?

"Mr. SMITH. Perhaps I may say in this way: Chosen by the body, the twelve themselves, by and with the consent and approval of the first presidency.

"Senator HOAR. Was there a revelation in regard to each of them?

"Mr. SMITH. No, sir; not in regard to each of them. Do you mean in the beginning?

"Senator HOAR. I understand you to say that the original twelve apostles were selected by revelation?

"Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; that is right.

"Senator HOAR. Is there any revelation in regard to the subsequent ones?

"Mr. SMITH. No, sir; it has been the choice of the body.

"Senator MCCOMAS. Then the apostles are perpetuated in succession by their own act and the approval of the first presidency?

"Mr. SMITH. That is right."

To the same effect is the testimony of Francis M. Lyman.

It further appears that any one of the twelve apostles may be removed by his fellow-apostles without consulting the members of the church in general. It is also in proof that the first presidency and twelve apostles govern the church by means of so-called "revelations from God," which revelations are given to the membership of the church as emanating from divine authority. It is also shown that those members of the Mormon Church who refuse to obey the revelations so communicated by the priesthood thereby become out of harmony with the church and are thus practically excluded from the blessings, benefits, and privileges of membership in the church.

It is also well established by the testimony that the members of the Mormon Church are governed in all things by the first presidency and twelve apostles. That this authority is extended to the membership through a series and succession of subordinate officials, consisting of presidents of seventies, presiding bishops, elders, presidents of stakes, bishops, and other officials. That one of the chief requirements by the leaders of the church is that members shall take counsel of their religious superiors in all things whatsoever, whether civil or religious, temporal or spiritual. That the failure to receive and obey counsel in any of these matters subjects the one who refuses to the discipline of the church. That this discipline is administered in the first instance by the subordinate officials, subject to the right to appeal to the higher officials of the church, and ultimately to the first president and twelve apostles. These rules, enforced, as they are, by the discipline of the Mormon Church, constitute the first president and twelve apostles a hierarchy, a body of men at the head of a religious organization governing their followers with absolute and unquestioned authority in all things relating to temporal and political as well as to spiritual affairs.

The testimony taken before the committee also shows beyond a reasonable doubt that this authority of the first presidency and twelve apostles is so exercised over the members of the Mormon Church as to inculcate a belief in the divine origin of polygamy and its rightfulness as a practice, and also to encourage the membership of that church in the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation. While this is denied on the part of the officials of the church, the truthfulness of the claim of the protestants in this regard is shown by a great number of facts and circumstances, no one of which is perhaps conclusive in itself, but when taken together form a volume of testimony so cogent and convincing as to leave no reasonable doubt in the mind that the truth is as stated by the protestants. It is proved without denial that the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, one of the leading authorities of the Mormon Church, and still circulated by that church as a book equal in authority to the Bible and the Book of Mormon, contains the revelation regarding polygamy, of which the following is a part:

"61. And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood: If any man espouse a virgin and desires to espouse another and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins and have vowed to no other man, then he is justified—he can not commit adultery, for they are given unto him; for he can not commit adultery with that that belongeth to him and to no one else.

"62. And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law he can not commit adultery, for they belong to him and they are given unto him; therefore is he justified.

"63. But if one or either of the ten virgins, after she is espoused, shall be with another man she has committed adultery and shall be destroyed, for they are given unto him to multiply and replenish the earth, according to my commandment, and to fulfill the promise which was given by my Father before the foundation of the world; and for their exaltation in the eternal worlds, that they may bear the souls of men; for herein is the work of my Father continued, that he may be glorified.

"64. And again, verily, verily, I say unto you, if any man hath a wife who holds the keys of this power and he teaches unto her the law of my priesthood, as pertaining these things, then shall she believe and administer unto him or she shall be destroyed, said the Lord your God, for I will destroy her; for I will mangify my name upon all those who receive and abide in my law.

"65. Therefore, it shall be lawful in me, if she receives not this law for him to receive all things whatsoever I, the Lord his God, will give unto him, because she did not minister unto him according to my word; and she then becomes the transgressor; and he is exempt from the law of Sarah who ministered unto Abraham according to the law when I commanded Abraham to take Hager to wife."

It is also shown that numerous other publications of the Mormon Church are still circulated among the members of that church with the knowledge and by the authority of the church officials, which contain arguments in favor of polygamy. The Book of Doctrine and Covenants is not only still put forth to the members of the church as authoritative in all respects, but the first presidency and twelve apostles have never incorporated therein the manifesto forbidding the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, nor have they at any time or in any way qualified the reputed revelation to Joseph Smith regarding polygamy. And this Book of Doctrine and Covenants, containing the polygamic revelation is regarded by Mormons as being of higher authority than the manifesto suspending polygamy.

Bearing in mind the authority of the first presidency and twelve apostles over the whole body of the Mormon Church, it is very evident that if polygamy were discountenanced by the leaders of that church it would very soon be a thing of the past among the members of that church. On the contrary, it appears that since the admission of Utah into the Union as a State the authorities of the Mormon Church have countenanced and encouraged the commission of the crime of polygamy instead of preventing it, as they could easily have done.

A sufficient number of specific instances of the taking of plural wives since the "manifesto of 1890," so called, have been shown by the testimony as having taken place among officials of the Mormon Church to demonstrate the fact that the leaders in this church, the first presidency and the twelve apostles, connive at the practice of taking plural wives, and have done so ever since the manifesto was issued which purported to put an end to the practice. It has been shown by the testimony, so clearly as to leave no doubt of the fact, that as late as 1896 one Lillian Hamlin became the plural wife of Abraham H. Cannon, who was then an apostle of the Mormon Church. This is shown by the proof of these facts:

Down to the year 1895 Lillian Hamlin was a single woman. In 1896 she received attentions from Abraham H. Cannon, these attentions being of a character to indicate that there was more than a friendly relation existing between the two. In June, 1896, Abraham H. Cannon informed his plural wife that he was going to California with Joseph F. Smith and Lillian Hamlin to be married to Lillian Hamlin at some place outside the United States. While in California Joseph F. Smith went with Abraham H. Cannon and Lillian Hamlin from Los Angeles to Catalina Island. After the return of the party to Los Angeles, Abraham H. Cannon and Lillian Hamlin lived together as husband and wife. Returning to Salt Lake City, Abraham H. Cannon told his plural wife that he had been married to Lillian Hamlin. From that time it was generally reputed in the community and understood by the families of both Abraham H. Cannon and Lillian Hamlin that a marriage had taken place between them; that they had been married on the high seas by Joseph F. Smith. Lillian Hamlin assumed the name of Cannon, and a child to which she afterwards gave birth bears the name of Cannon and inherited a share of the estate of Abraham H. Cannon. The prominence of Abraham H. Cannon in the church, the publicity given to the fact of his taking Lillian Hamlin as a plural wife, render it practically impossible that this should have been done without the knowledge, the consent, and the connivance of the headship of that church.

George Teasdale, another apostle of the Morman Church, contracted a plural marriage with Marion Scholes since the manifesto of 1890. The president of the Morman Church endeavors to excuse this act upon the pretext that the first marriage of George Teasdale was not a legal marriage, but the testimony taken from the divorce proceedings which separated George Teasdale from his lawful wife wholly controverts this assertion on the part of President Smith.

It is also in evidence that Walter Steed, a prominent Mormon, contracted a plural marriage after the manifesto of 1890. Charles E. Merrill, a bishop of the Mormon Church, took a plural wife in 1891, more than a year after the issuing of the manifesto. The ceremony uniting said Merrill to his plural wife was performed by his father, who was then and until the time of his death an apostle in the Mormon Church. It is also shown that John W. Taylor, another apostle of the Mormon Church, has been married to two plural wives since the issuing of the so-called manifesto.

Matthias F. Cowley, another of the twelve apostles, has also taken one or more plural wives since the manifesto. While the proof that Apostles Taylor and Cowley have married plural wives since the manifesto may not be so free from all possible doubt as is the proof in the case of Abraham Cannon, the fact that the proofs presented to the committee showing such marriages by Taylor and Cannon stand wholly uncontroverted, and the further fact that Apostles Taylor and Cowley, instead of appearing before the committee and denying the allegation, evade service of process issued by the committee for their appearance, and refuse to appear after being requested to do so, warrant the conclusion that the allegation is true and that said Taylor and Cowley have taken plural wives since the manifesto.

While the fact does not appear from any sworn testimony in the case, it is a matter of common report that Taylor and Cowley have recently been dropped from the list of apostles. But this fact in no way counteracts the influence of the Mormon leaders in their encouragement of polygamy. When Taylor and Cowley took their more recent plural wives they were numbered among the apostles in good standing. The fact that they had taken plural wives since the manifesto was well known to their associates for months and years. But they were continued as apostles, and no action was taken in the case of either until the facts were revealed to the world by this investigation. And it is worthy of note that these apostles have not been complained of or brought to trial before the church courts for disobeying the manifesto, nor have they been deprived of their offices or honors in the church (as was done in the case of Moses Thatcher for a political offense), but they are still members of the church in good standing, each still holds the office of an elder in the church, and each is still a member of the high priesthood of the church.

The dropping of Taylor and Cowley from the quorum of the twelve apostles was so evidently done for popular effect that the act merits no consideration whatever, except as an admission by the first presidency and twelve apostles that Apostles Taylor and Cowley have each taken one or more plural wives since the manifesto.

It is also proved that about the year 1896 James Francis Johnson was married to a plural wife, Clara Mabel Barber, the ceremony in this instance being performed by an apostle of the Mormon Church. To these cases must be added that of Marriner W. Merrill, another apostle; J. M. Tanner, superintendent of church schools; Benjamin Cluff, jr., president of Brigham Young University; Thomas Chamberlain, counselor to the president of a stake; Bishop Rathall, John Silver, Winslow Farr, Heber Benion, Samuel S. Newton, a man named Okey, who contracted a plural marriage with Ovena Jorgensen in the year 1897, and Morris Michelson about the year 1902. In the case of Benjamin Cluff, jr., before referred to, the polygamous marriage was tacitly sanctioned by President Joseph F. Smith when he "referred to Sister Cluff and the work she had been doing among the children in Colonia Diaz, Mexico."

It is morally impossible that all these violations of the laws of the State of Utah by the contracting of plural marriages could have been committed without the knowledge of the first presidency and the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. In two of the above cases, that of George Teasdale and that of Benjamin Cluff, jr., the fact of the plural marriage was directly communicated to the president of the church, Joseph F. Smith, and in the other cases, with the possible exception of James Francis Johnson, the fact of a plural marriage having been celebrated was so well known throughout the community that it is not conceivable that such marriages would not have been called to the attention of the leaders of the church. Indeed, there was no denial on the part of the first president or any one of the twelve apostles that they learned of the fact that plural marriages were being contracted by officials of the Mormon Church and that no attention was paid to the matter. The excuse given by them was that it was not their duty to interfere in such matters; that the law furnished a remedy. Furthermore, it was shown by the testimony of one of the twelve apostles and of other witnesses that "under the established law of the church no person could secure a plural wife except by consent of the president of the church."

SUPPRESSION OF TESTIMONY BY MORMON LEADERS.

It is a fact of no little significance in itself, bearing on the question whether polygamous marriages have been recently contracted in Utah by the connivance of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church, that the authorities of said church have endeavored to suppress, and have succeeded in suppressing, a great deal of testimony by which the fact of plural marriages contracted by those who were high in the councils of the church might have been established beyond the shadow of a doubt. Before the investigation had begun it was well known in Salt Lake City that it was expected to show on the part of the protestants that Apostles George Teasdale, John W. Taylor, and M. F. Cowley, and also Prof. J. M. Tanner, Samuel Newton, and others, who were all high officials of the Mormon Church, had recently taken plural wives, and that in 1896 Lillian Hamlin was sealed to Apostle Abraham H. Cannon as a plural wife by one of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. All, or nearly all, of these persons except Abraham H. Cannon, who was deceased, were then within reach of service of process from the committee. But shortly before the investigation began all these witnesses went out of the country.

Subpœnas were issued for each one of the witnesses named, but in the case of Samuel Newton only could the process of the committee be served. Mr. Newton refused to obey the order of the committee, alleging no reason or excuse for not appearing. It is shown that John W. Taylor was sent out of the country by Joseph F. Smith on a real or pretended mission for the church. And it is undeniably true that not only the apostles, but also all other officials of the Mormon Church, are at all times subject to the orders of the governing authorities of the church.

It would be nothing short of self-stultification for one to believe that all these most important witnesses chanced to leave the United States at about the same time and without reference to the investigation. All the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction point to the conclusion that every one of the witnesses named left the country at the instance of the rulers of the Mormon Church and to avoid testifying before the committee. It is, furthermore, a fact which can not be questioned that every one of these witnesses is under the direction and control of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. Had those officials seen fit to direct the witnesses named to return to the United States and give their testimony before the committee, they would have been obliged to do so. The reason why the said witnesses left the country and have refused to come before the committee is easy to understand, in view of the testimony showing the contracting of plural marriages by prominent officials of the Mormon Church within the past few years.

It was claimed by the protestants that the records kept in the Mormon temple at Salt Lake City and Logan would disclose the fact that plural marriages have been contracted in Utah since the manifesto with the sanction of the officials of the church. A witness who was required to bring the records in the temple at Salt Lake City refused to do so after consulting with President Smith. It is claimed by counsel for Mr. SMOOT that this witness was not mentally competent to testify; but his testimony may be searched in vain for any internal evidence of such incompetency, and there was nothing in the appearance of the witness when testifying to suggest to the committee that he was not as competent to testify as any witness who was examined during the course of the investigation.

The witness who was required to bring the records kept in the temple at Logan excused himself from attending on the plea of ill health. But the important part of the mandate of the committee—the production of the records—was not obeyed by sending the records, which could easily have been done.

In the case of other witnesses who were believed to have contracted plural marriages since the year 1890 all sorts of shifts, tricks, and evasions were resorted to in order to avoid service of a subpœna to appear before the committee and testify.

These instances of the suppression of testimony by the direct order or tacit consent of the ruling authorities of the Mormon Church warrant the committee in believing that the suppressed testimony would, if produced, strongly corroborate the testimony which was given, showing that those who direct the affairs of the Mormon Church countenance and encourage polygamous marriages, as well as polygamous cohabitation, and that the allegations of the protestants in that regard are true.

MORMON OFFICIALS LIVING IN POLYGAMOUS COHABITATION.

Aside from this it was shown by the testimony, and in such a way that the fact could not possibly be controverted, that a majority of those who give the law to the Mormon Church are now, and have been for years, living in open, notorious, and shameless polygamous cohabitation. The list of those who are thus guilty of violating the laws of the State and the rules of public decency is headed by Joseph F. Smith, the first president, "prophet, seer, and revelator" of the Mormon Church, who testified in regard to that subject as follows:

"Mr. TAYLOR. Is the cohabitation with one who is claimed to be a plural wife a violation of the law of the church as well as of the law of the land?

"Mr. SMITH. That was the case, and is the case even to-day.

"Mr. TAYLOR. What was the case, what you are about to say?

"Mr. SMITH. That it is contrary to the rule of the church, and contrary as well to the law of the land, for a man to cohabit with his wives. * * * I have cohabited with my wives; not openly—that is, not in a manner that I thought would be offensive to my neighbors—but I acknowledged them. I have visited them. They have borne me children since 1890, and I have done it, knowing the responsibility and knowing that I was amenable to the law.

"Mr. TAYLOR. In 1892, Mr. Smith, how many wives did you have?

"Mr. SMITH. In 1892?

"Mr. TAYLOR. Yes.

"Mr. SMITH. I had five. * * *

"Mr. TAYLOR. My question is, How many children have been born to him by these wives since 1890?

"Mr. SMITH. I had eleven children born since 1890.

"Mr. TAYLOR. Those are all the children that have been born to you since 1890?

"Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; those are all.

"Mr. TAYLOR. Were those children by all of your wives; that is, did all of your wives bear children?

"Mr. SMITH. All of my wives bore children.

"Mr. TAYLOR. Since 1890?

"Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

"The CHAIRMAN. I understand since 1890?

"Mr. SMITH. Since 1890. I said that I have had born to me eleven children since 1890, each of my wives being the mother of from one to two of those children. * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Smith, I will not press it, but I will ask you if you have any objection to stating how many children you have in all.

"Mr. SMITH. Altogether?

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

"Mr. SMITH. I have had born to me, sir, forty-two children—twenty-one boys and twenty-one girls—and I am proud of every one of them. * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you obey the law in having five wives at this time and having them bear to you eleven children since the manifesto of 1890?

"Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I have not claimed that in that case I have obeyed the law of the land.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

"Mr. SMITH. I do not claim so, and, as I said before, that I prefer to stand my chances against the law." (Vol. 1, pp. 129, 133, 148, 197, 382.)

The list also includes George Teasdale, an apostle; John W. Taylor, an apostle; John Henry Smith, an apostle; Marriner W. Merrill, also an apostle; Heber J. Grant, an apostle; M. F. Cowley, an apostle; Charles W. Penrose, an apostle, and Francis M. Lyman, who is not only an apostle, but the probable successor of Joseph F. Smith as president of the church. Thus it appears that the first president and eight of the twelve apostles, a considerable majority of the ruling authorities of the Mormon Church, are noted polygamists.

In addition to these, the list includes Brigham H. Roberts, who is one of the presidents of seventies and a leading official of the church; J. M. Tanner, superintendent of the church schools; Andrew Jenson, assistant historian of the church; Thomas H. Merrill, a bishop of the church; Alma Merrill, one of the presidency of a church stake; Angus M. Cannon, patriarch of the Mormon Church; a man named Greenwald, who is at the head of a church school; George Reynolds, one of the first seven presidents of seventies and first assistant superintendent of Sunday schools of the world; George H. Brimhall, president of Brigham Young University, and Joseph Hickman, teacher in Brigham Young University. All the officials named were appointed, either directly or indirectly, by the first presidency and twelve apostles; and in the case of J. M. Tanner his appointment to his present office was made after he had been compelled to resign his position as president of the agricultural college because of the fact that he was a polygamist.

These facts abundantly justify the assertion made in the protest that "the supreme authorities in the church, of whom Senator-elect REED SMOOT is one, to wit, the first presidency and twelve apostles, not only connive at violation of, but protect and honor the violators of the laws against polygamy and polygamous cohabitation."

It will be seen by the foregoing that not only do the first presidency and twelve apostles encourage polygamy by precept and teaching, but that a majority of the members of that body of rulers of the Mormon people give the practice of polygamy still further and greater encouragement by living the lives of polygamists, and this openly and in the sight of all their followers in the Mormon Church. It can not be doubted that this method of encouraging polygamy is much more efficacious than the teaching of that crime by means of the writings and publications of the leaders of the church, and this upon the familiar principle that "actions speak louder than words."

And not only do the president and a majority of the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church practice polygamy, but in the case of each and every one guilty of this crime who testified before the committee the determination was expressed openly and defiantly to continue the commission of this crime without regard to the mandates of the law or the prohibition contained in the manifesto. And it is in evidence that the said first president, addressing a large concourse of the members of the Mormon Church at the tabernacle in Salt Lake City in the month of June, 1904, declared that if he were to discontinue the polygamous relation with his plural wives he should be forever damned, and forever deprived of the companionship of God and those most dear to him throughout eternity. Thus it appears that the "prophet, seer, and revelator" of the Mormon Church pronounces a decree of eternal condemnation throughout all eternity upon all members of the Mormon Church who, having taken plural wives, fail to continue the polygamous relation. So that the testimony upon that subject, taken as a whole, can leave no doubt upon any reasonable mind that the allegations in the protest are true, and that those who are in authority in the Mormon Church, of whom Mr. SMOOT is one, are encouraging the practice of polygamy among the members of that church, and that polygamy is being practiced to such an extent as to call for the severest condemnation in all legitimate ways.

THE MANIFESTO A DECEPTION.

Against these facts the authorities of the Mormon Church urge that in the year 1890 what is generally termed "a manifesto" was issued by the first presidency of that church, suspending the practice of polygamy among the members of that church. It may be said in the first place that this manifesto misstates the facts in regard to the solemnization of plural marriages within a short period preceding the issuing of the manifesto. It now appears that in a number of instances plural marriages had been solemnized in the Mormon Church, and, in the case of those high in authority in that church, within a very few months preceding the issuing of the manifesto.

It is also observable that this manifesto in no way declares the principle of polygamy to be wrong or abrogates it as a doctrine of the Mormon Church, but simply suspends the practice of polygamy to be resumed at some more convenient season, either with or without another revelation. It is now claimed by the first president and other prominent officials of the Mormon Church that the manifesto was not a revelation, but was, at the most, an inspired document, designed "to meet the hard conditions then confronting" those who were practicing polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, leaving what the Mormon leaders are pleased to term "the principle of plural marriage" as much a tenet of their faith and rule of practice when possible, as it was before the manifesto was issued. Upon that subject Joseph F. Smith testified as follows:

"Mr. TAYLOR. The revelation which Wilford Woodruff received in consequence of which the command to take plural wives was suspended did not, as you understand, change the divine view of plural marriage, did it?

"Mr. TAYLOR. It did not change your belief at all?

"Mr. TAYLOR. It did not change your belief?

"Mr. SMITH. Not at all, sir.

"Mr. TAYLOR. You continued to believe that plural marriages were right?

"Mr. SMITH. We did. I did, at least. I do not answer for anybody else. I continue to believe as I did before. (Vol. 1, p. 107.)

"Senator HOAR. The apostle says that a bishop must be sober and must be the husband of one wife.

"Mr. SMITH. At least."

And one of the twelve apostles has declared the fact to be that "the manifesto is only a trick to beat the devil at his own game." Further than this, it is conceded by all that this manifesto was intended to prohibit polygamous cohabitation as strongly as it prohibited the solemnization of plural marriages. In the case of polygamous cohabitation, the manifesto has been wholly disregarded by the members of the Mormon Church. It is hardly reasonable to expect that the members of that church would have any greater regard for the prohibition of plural marriage.

The contention that the practice of polygamy is rightful as a religious ceremony and therefore protected by that provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," ought to be forever set at rest by the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of the Mormon Church v. The United States, Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"One pretense for this obstinate course is that their belief in the practice of polygamy, or in the right to indulge in it, is a religious belief, and therefore under the protection of the constitutional guaranty of religious freedom. This is altogether a sophistical plea. No doubt the Thugee of India imagined that their belief in the right of assassination was a religious belief; but their thinking so did not make it so. The practice of suttee by the Hindu widows may have sprung from a supposed religious conviction. The offering of human sacrifices by our own ancestors in Britain was no doubt sanctioned by an equally conscientious impulse. But no one on that account would hesitate to brand these practices now as crimes against society and obnoxious to condemnation and punishment by the civil authority."

In the case of Davis v. Beason, Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"Bigamy and polygamy are crimes by the laws of all civilized and Christian countries. They are crimes by the laws of the United States, and they are crimes by the laws of Idaho. They tend to destroy the purity of the marriage relation, to disturb the peace of families, to degrade woman, and to debase man. Few crimes are more pernicious to the best interests of society and receive more general or more deserved punishment. To extend exemption from punishment for such crimes would be to shock the moral judgment of the community. To call their advocacy a tenet of religion is to offend the common sense of mankind."

ONE LIVING IN POLYGAMOUS COHABITATION IS IN LAW A POLYGAMIST.

The members of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church claim that there is a distinction between what they term polygamy—that is, the contracting of plural marriages—and polygamous cohabitation with plural wives. But under the circumstances this distinction is little short of ridiculous. As is demonstrated by the testimony, the so-called manifesto was aimed at polygamous cohabitation, as well as against the taking of plural wives, and it is the veriest sophistry to contend that open notorious cohabitation with plural wives is less offensive to public morals than the taking of additional wives. Indeed, it is the testimony of some of those who reside in communities that are cursed by the evils of polygamy that polygamous cohabitation is fully as offensive to the sense of decency of the inhabitants of those communities as would be the taking of plural wives.

And this excuse of the Mormon leaders is as baseless in law as it is in morals. In the case of Murphy v. Ramsay, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and reported in the United States Supreme Court Reports, volume 114, page 15, it was decided that any man is a polygamist who maintains the relation of husband to a plurality of wives, even though in fact he may cohabit with only one. The court further held in the same case that a man occupying this relation to two or more women can only cease to be a polygamist when he has finally and fully dissolved the relation of husband to several wives. In other words, there is and can be no practical difference in law or in morals between the offense of taking plural wives and the offense of polygamous cohabitation. The same doctrine is affirmed in the case of Cannon v. United States (116 U. S. Supreme Court Reports, p. 55).

MR. SMOOT RESPONSIBLE FOR THE CONDUCT OF THE ORGANIZATION TO WHICH HE BELONGS.

It is urged in behalf of Mr. SMOOT that, conceding it to be true that the first president and some of the apostles are living in polygamy and that some of the leaders of the Mormon Church encourage polygamous practices, Mr. SMOOT himself is not a polygamist, does not practice polygamy, and that there is no evidence that he has personally and individually encouraged the practice of polygamy by members of the Mormon Church, and that he ought not to be condemned because of the acts of his associates. This position is wholly untenable. Mr. SMOOT is an inseparable part of the governing body of the Mormon Church—the first presidency and twelve apostles—and those who compose that organization form a unit, an entirety, and whatever is done by that organization is the act of each and every member thereof, and whatever policy is adopted and pursued by the body which controls the Mormon Church Mr. SMOOT must be held to be responsible for as a member of that body. That one may be legally, as well as morally, responsible for unlawful acts which he does not himself commit is a rule of law too elementary to require discussion. "What one does by another he does by himself" is a maxim as old as the common law. And as the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church have authority over the spiritual affairs of the members of that church, it follows that such governing body of said church has supreme authority over the members of that church in respect to the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation.

In England in former years, and under the canon law, matters of marriage, divorce, and legitimacy were under the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts of the Kingdom, in which the punishment was in the nature of a spiritual penalty for the good of the soul of the offender, this penalty in many cases being that of excommunication or expulsion from the church. (1 Blackstone's Commentaries, 431; 3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 92; 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, 153 and note; Reynolds v. United States, 98 U. S., 145, 164–165.) And in later years, while the civil law now prohibits and punishes bigamy, the authorities of every Christian church in this country take cognizance of matrimonial affairs and by the authority of the church in spiritual matters prevent and punish by censure or expulsion any infraction of the rules of the church regarding marriage.

The testimony taken upon this investigation shows beyond controversy that the authority of the first presidency and the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church over the members of said church is such that were the said first presidency and twelve apostles to prohibit the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation by its members and abandon the practice themselves and expel from the church all who should persist in the practice those offenses would instantly cease in that church. And the fact that not a single member of the Mormon Church has ever fallen into disfavor on account of polygamous practices is conclusive proof that the ruling authorities of that church countenance and encourage polygamy.

The conduct of Mr. SMOOT in this regard can not be separated from that of his associates in the government of the Mormon Church. Whatever his private opinions or his private conduct may be, he stands before the world as an integral part of the organization which encourages, counsels, and approves polygamy, which not only fails to discipline those who break the laws of the country, but, on the contrary, loads with honors and favors those who are among the most noted polygamists within the pale of that church.

It is an elementary principle of law that where two or more persons are associated together in an act, an organization, an enterprise, or a course of conduct which is in its character or purpose unlawful the act of any one of those who are thus associated is the act of all, and the act of any number of the associates is the act of each one of the others.

An eminent legal authority says:

"Every person entering into a conspiracy or common design already formed is deemed in law a party to all acts done by any of the other parties, before or afterwards, in furtherance of the common design. The principle on which the acts and declarations of other conspirators, and acts done at different times, are admitted in evidence against the persons prosecuted is that by the act of conspiring together the conspirators have jointly assumed to themselves, as a body, the attribute of individuality so far as regards the prosecution of the common design, thus rendering whatever is done or said by anyone in furtherance of that design a part of the res gestæ and therefore the act of all. (2 Greenleaf on Evidence, secs. 93, 94. See also Commonwealth v. Warren, 6 Mass., 74; People v. Mather, 4 Wend., 229, 260; People v. Peckens, 153 N. Y., 576, 586, 593; United States v. Gooding, 12 Wheaton, 459, 469; American Fur Company v. United States, 2 Peters, 358, 365; Nudd et al. v. Burrows, 91 U. S., 426, 438; United States v. Mitchell, 1 Hughes, 439 (Federal Cases, No. 15790); Stewart v. Johnson, 3 Har. (N. J.), 87; Hinchman v. Ritchie, Brightley's N. P. (Pa), 143; Freeman v. Stine, 34 Leg. Int. (Pa.), 95; Spies et al. v. People, 122 Illinois, 1.)"

The case last cited illustrates this principle more forcibly than any of the others referred to. In that case, which is commonly known as "the anarchists' case," there was, as to some of the defendants, very little evidence, and as to others of the defendants no satisfactory evidence that they were present at the commission of the murder with which they were charged, or advised or intended the murder which was committed by an unknown person. But it was proved that the defendants were members of an organization known as the International Association of Chicago, having for its object the destruction of the law and government and incidentally of the police and militia as the representatives of law and government, and that some of the defendants had, by spoken and printed appeals to workingmen and others, urged the use of force, deadly weapons, and dynamite in resistance to the law and its officers.

In denying the motion for a new trial in the anarchists' case the judge who presided at the trial used the following language:

"Now on the question of the instructions, whether these defendants, or any of them, anticipated or expected the throwing of the bomb on the night of the 4th of May is not a question which I need to consider, because the conviction can not be sustained, if that is necessary to a conviction, however much evidence of it there may be, because the instructions do not go upon that ground. The jury were not instructed to find the defendants guilty if they believed they participated in the throwing of that bomb, or advised or encouraged the throwing of that bomb, or anything of that sort. Conviction has not gone upon the ground that they did have any personal participation in the particular act which caused the death of Degan, but the conviction proceeds upon the ground, under the instructions, that they had generally by speech and print, advised large classes of the people, not particular individuals, but large classes, to commit murder, and have left the commission, time, and place, to the individual will and whim, or caprice, or whatever it may be, of each individual man who listened to their advice and, influenced by that advice, somebody not known did throw the bomb which caused Degan's death." (Century Magazine, April, 1893, p. 835.)

It will be seen by the decision of the court upon the motion for a new trial in the case of Spies et al v. People that the anarchists were not convicted upon the ground that they had participated in the murder of which they were convicted. Whether they were or were not participants in the commission of this crime was not the main question at issue. They were convicted because they belonged to an organization which, as an organization, advised the commission of acts which would lead to murder.

Of like import is the decision in the case of Davis v. Beason, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1889, the decision being reported in volume 133, United States Supreme Court Reports, page 333. At the time of this decision the Revised Statutes of the State of Idaho provided that no person "who is a member of any order, organization, or association which teaches, advises, counsels, or encourages its members, devotees, or any other persons to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy, or any other crime defined by law, either as a rite or ceremony of such order, organization, or association or otherwise, is permitted to vote at any election or to hold any position or office of honor, trust, or profit within this Territory."

This provision of law the Supreme Court of the United States held to be constitutional and legal. It will be observed that this act disfranchises certain persons and makes them ineligible to any position or office of honor, trust, or profit, not for committing the crime of polygamy, nor for teaching, advising, counseling, or encouraging others to commit the crime, but because of their membership in an organization which teaches, advises, counsels, and encourages others to commit the crime of polygamy. In Wooley v. Watkins (2 Idaho Rep., 555, 566), the court say:

"Orders, organizations, and associations, by whatever name they may be called, which teach, advise, counsel, or encourage the practice or commission of acts forbidden by law, are criminal organizations. To become and continue to be members of such organizations or associations are such overt acts of recognition and participation as make them particeps criminis and as guilty, in contemplation of criminal law, as though they actually engaged in furthering their unlawful objects and purposes." (See also Innis v. Bolton, 2 Idaho Rep., 407, 414.)

It being a fact that the first presidency and the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church teach, advise, counsel, and encourage the members of that church to practice polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, which are contrary to both law and morals, and Mr. SMOOT, being a member of that organization, he must fall under the same condemnation.

And the rule in civil cases is the same as that which obtains in the administration of criminal law. One who is a member of an association of any nature is bound by the action of his associates, whether he favors or disapproves of such action. He can at any time protect himself from the consequences of any future action of his associates by withdrawing from the association, but while he remains a member of the association he is responsible for whatever his associates may do.

MR. SMOOT HAS COUNTENANCED AND ENCOURAGED POLYGAMY.

But the complicity of Mr. SMOOT in the conduct of the leaders of the Mormon Church in encouraging polygamy and polygamous cohabitation does not consist wholly in the fact that he is one of the governing body of that church. By repeated acts, and in a number of instances, Mr. SMOOT has, as a member of the quorum of the twelve apostles, given active aid and support to the members of the first presidency and twelve apostles in their defiance of the laws of the State of Utah and of the laws of common decency, and their encouragement of polygamous practices by both precept and example.

It is shown by the testimony of Mr. SMOOT himself that he assisted in the elevation of Joseph F. Smith to the presidency of the Mormon Church. That he has since repeatedly voted to sustain said Joseph F. Smith, and that he so voted after full knowledge that said Joseph F. Smith was living in polygamous cohabitation and had asserted his intention to continue in this course in defiance of the laws of God and man. He also assisted in the selection of Heber J. Grant as president of a mission when it was a matter of common notoriety that said Heber J. Grant was a polygamist. He voted for the election of Charles W. Penrose as an apostle of the Mormon Church after testimony had been given in this investigation showing him to be a polygamist. It is difficult to perceive how Mr. SMOOT could have given greater encouragement to polygamy and polygamous cohabitation than by thus assisting in conferring one of the highest honors and offices in the Mormon Church on one who had been and was then guilty of these crimes. As trustee of an educational institution he made no protest against the continuance in office of Benjamin Cluff, jr., a noted polygamist, as president of that institution, nor made any effort to discover the truth that said Cluff had taken another plural wife long after the manifesto. Nor did he make any protest, as such trustee, against the election of George H. Brimhall, another polygamist, in the place of Benjamin Cluff, jr.

Since his election as an apostle of the Mormon Church Mr. SMOOT has been intimately associated with the first president and with those who—with himself—constitute the counsel of the twelve apostles. The fact that many of these officials were living in polygamous relations with a number of wives was a matter of such common knowledge in the community that it is incredible that Mr. SMOOT should not have had sufficient notice of this condition of affairs to at least have put him on inquiry. If he did not know of these facts it was because he took pains not to be informed of them. At no time has he uttered a syllable of protest against the conduct of his associates in the leadership of the Mormon Church, but, on the contrary, has sustained them in their encouragement of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, both by his acts (as hereinbefore set forth) and by his silence. In the judgment of the committee, Mr. SMOOT is no more entitled to a seat in the Senate than he would be if he were associating in polygamous cohabitation with a plurality of wives.

DOMINATION OF LEADERS OF THE MORMON CHURCH IN SECULAR AFFAIRS.

A careful examination and consideration of the testimony taken before the committee in this investigation leads to the conclusion that the allegations in the protest concerning the domination of the leaders of the Mormon Church in secular affairs are true, and that the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints exercise a controlling influence over the action of the members of that church in secular affairs as well as in spiritual matters; and that, contrary to the principles of the common law under which we live and the constitution of the State of Utah, the said first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church dominate the affairs of the State and constantly interfere in the performance of its functions. The domination by the leaders of the church under their claim to exercise divine authority in all matters is manifested in a general way in innumerable instances.

The right to do so is openly claimed by those who profess to speak in behalf of the church. As late as February 25, 1904, one of the twelve apostles, in a public address, said "that from the view point of the gospel there could be no separation of temporal and spiritual things, and those who object to church people advising and taking part in temporal things have no true conception of the gospel of Christ and the mission of the church."

The method by which the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church direct all the temporal affairs of the members of that church under the claim that such direction is by divine authority, is by requiring the members of the church in all their affairs, both spiritual and temporal, and especially the latter, to "take counsel." This means that they are to be advised by their immediate superiors. These superiors in turn take their instructions from those above them, and so on back to the point whence most, if not all, these directions emanate—that is, the first presidency and twelve apostles.

As was said by Mr. Chief Justice Zane, of Utah, in 1887:

"At the head of this corporate body, according to the faith professed, is a seer and revelator, who receives in revelations the will of the infinite God concerning the duty that man owes to himself, to his fellow-beings, to society, to human government, and to God. In subordination to this head are a vast number of officials of various kinds and descriptions, comprising a most minute and complete organization. The people comprising this organization claim to direct and lead by inspiration which is above all human wisdom, subject to a power above all municipal government, above all man-made law." (Vol. 1, p. 809.)

The phrase "take counsel" does not mean that the members of the church shall inquire of those above them in all cases concerning their action, but that they shall receive counsel—that is, direction—from those above them, and this counsel they are to implicitly obey. If they fail to do so they are excommunicated from the church and deprived, not only of the privileges of membership in the church, but, as they are assured and believe, they thereby forfeit all hope of happiness in a future life. The absolute submission of the great mass of the Mormon Church is illustrated by the fact that it is laid down by the leaders of the church as a cardinal principle to the members that, if their file leaders say white is black, "it is their duty to say 'white is black.'"

Instances of the interference of the leaders of the Mormon Church in the secular affairs of their followers could be multiplied almost without number.

In one case a bishop of the church was deposed from his offices in the church because he promised to obey the laws against polygamy.

Another official of the Mormon Church was excommunicated for belonging to an organization for the enforcement of the laws and opposing the interference of the church in public affairs.

Another Mormon official was degraded in the church for refusing to obey his file leader.

In another case the members of a firm doing business in Salt Lake City were expelled from the Mormon Church because they persisted in engaging in mining operations contrary to the command of the authorities of the church.

In another instance the church authorities interfered in the matter of the establishment of an electric-light plant.

In 1903 two members of the Mormon Church who built a dancing pavilion in opposition to the "counsel" of the church authorities were summoned for trial and excommunication, and finally compromised the matter by turning over to the church officials the management of the pavilion and 25 per cent of the net earnings.

In another case there was a general understanding that the church, by its authorities, directed the location of a railroad station. In 1869 four members of the Mormon Church were excommunicated for apostacy in desiring "to open up mines against the teachings of the holy priesthood."

In another and recent instance, occurring as late as the early part of 1903, a Mormon official was deposed from his official position for writing a letter to a newspaper criticising Mr. SMOOT and his political ambitions.

In another instance, occurring in 1897, a Mormon official was deposed from his official relation to the church for distributing at a school election a ticket different from that prescribed by the church authorities.

In the year 1905 a teacher in the Mormon Church was cut off from the church for apostacy, the ostensible foundation for this charge being a criticism of the head of the church for his polygamous practices; the real ground being that the accused had persisted in engaging in the manufacture of salt, against the interests of the president of the church and some of his associates.

In what is known as the Birdsall case the officials of the Mormon Church assumed jurisdiction of a controversy concerning the title to real estate, and not only directed a conveyance of the title to a tract of land, but went further and enforced its decree by spiritual penalties. As has already been stated, no member of the Mormon Church (with possibly a single exception) has ever been disciplined for polygamy or polygamous cohabitation in defiance of the law and of the manifesto; but an obscure and feeble woman was excommunicated from the church and driven to the verge of insanity for refusing to obey the dictates of the church leaders and relinquish the title to a piece of land in favor of one who had no shadow of legal title thereto. As was testified by one of the witnesses for the protestants:

"Whenever a man disregards the teachings and instructions or counsels of the leaders of the church he has the spirit of apostasy."

A forcible illustration of the domination of the leaders of the Mormon Church over the secular affairs of the people is furnished by the fact that while a majority of these leaders have for years been living in polygamous relations, in defiance of law, no one dares to attempt to bring them to justice for fear of the consequences which would be visited by the church on the one who should make the complaint. And whenever one has been daring enough to make complaint for polygamous cohabitation against any member of the church the officers of the law have refused to prosecute, or those who were prosecuted and convicted have been released after the infliction of a merely nominal punishment.

The control which the governing body of the Mormon Church exercises over the secular affairs of the State of Utah is well illustrated by the fact that for many years past what are known as "religion classes" have been taught in connection with the public schools of that State. In these classes the youth of Utah are instructed in the doctrines of the Mormon Church by teachers in the public schools, supported by State taxation, the course of study being prescribed by officials of the church. This course of study includes the lives of noted Mormons whose chief claim to eminence in the church lies in their having taken a multiplicity of wives and in their continuance in the crime of polygamous cohabitation.

The teaching of the doctrines, faith, and practice of the Mormon Church in the public schools of Utah, under the direction of the high priesthood of the church, is not only contrary to the general law governing the use of schoolhouses as expounded by the courts of this country, but is also expressly forbidden by the constitution of the State of Utah, which provides, in article 1, section 4, as follows:

"No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercises, or instruction, or for the support of any ecclesiastical establishment." (Schofield v. School Dist., 27 Conn., 499; Spencer v. Joint School Dist., 15 Kans., 259; School District v. Arnold, 21 Wis., 657.)

Such teaching is also prohibited by a statute of the State of Utah, which declares that "No atheistic, infidel, sectarian, religious, or denominational doctrines shall be taught in any of the district schools of this State." (Revised Statutes of Utah, sec. 1848.)

The conduct of the ruling authorities of the Mormon Church in directing the teaching of "religion classes" in the schoolhouses of Utah affords a fair illustration of the contempt with which the rulers of that church treat all laws and restrictions which stand in the way of their desires, or of their own interests, or what they conceive to be the interests of the church of which they are the head.

The fact that these religion classes have been discontinued since their existence was revealed by this investigation serves to emphasize the truth that the Mormon Church dominates the affairs of the State of Utah in educational matters as well as in other respects.

POLITICAL DOMINATION OF THE MORMAN CHURCH.

But it is in political affairs that the domination of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church is most efficacious and most injurious to the interests of the State. The constitution of the State of Utah provides "There shall be no union of church and state, nor shall any church dominate the State or interefere with its functions." (Vol. 1, p. 25.) Notwithstanding this plain provision of the constitution of Utah, the proof offered on the investigation demonstrates beyond the possibility of doubt that the hierarchy at the head of the Mormon Church has for years past formed a perfect union between the Mormon Church and the State of Utah, and that the church through its head dominates the affairs of the State in things both great and small. Even before statehood was an accomplished fact, and while the State was in process of formation, and afterwards, during the sessions of the first and succeeding legislatures, it was notorious that a committee appointed by the leaders of the Mormon Church was supervising the legislation of the State.

At about the same time, or shortly prior thereto, it became known throughout Utah that the leading officials of the Mormon Church desired that the voters belonging to that church should so divide on political lines that about one half should belong to one of the great political parties of the nation and the other half to the other party, leaving a considerable number unassigned to either party, so that their votes could be cast for one party or the other, as might be necessary to further the interests of that church.

It is, of course, intended by the leaders of the church that this influence shall be secretly exerted, and this is in many cases, if not in most cases, easily accomplished by means of the perfect machinery of the church, which has been adverted to, by which the will of the first presidency and twelve apostles is transmitted through ecclesiastical channels, talked over in prayer circles of the high councils of the church, and then promulgated to the members of the church as "the will of the Lord." Notwithstanding this attempt at secrecy, it has for many years been a matter of common knowledge among the people of those States in which the Mormon Church is strongest that political influence is being continually exerted in the matter of State and lower municipal officials. As was said by one of the witnesses who testified on the investigation: "Whenever they indorse a man, he will be elected. Whenever they put upon him the seal of their disapprobation, he will not be."

It was shown in the investigation that in the State of Idaho candidates for office, in order to have any hope of success, must visit Salt Lake City and arrange for such success with the leaders of the Mormon Church. The result of this is that whatever the Mormon Church desires to have done, either by way of legislation or in the way of administration of the affairs of the State, is done, and whatever the Mormon Church desires shall not be done, is not done. So well recognized is this fact that in a State convention held in Idaho in the year 1904 one of the leading Mormons made the proposition that in case a certain resolution should be withdrawn he would go to Utah and ask the president of the Mormon Church to cease interfering in Idaho politics. Thus it appears that the Mormon Church dominates the affairs of the State of Idaho to an extent only less than it does the affairs of the State of Utah. As an illustration of this fact, it was shown that a bill in which the Mormon Church was vitally interested was passed by the legislature of Idaho shortly after the visit of one of the apostles of the Mormon Church, who came there for the purpose of procuring such legislation.

A striking illustration of the power of the Mormon Church in Utah in matters of legislation appears in the history of what is known as the "Evans bill," which was passed by both houses of the legislature of Utah in 1901, in order to prevent prosecutions for polygamous cohabitation. This bill was favored by the president of the Mormon Church and by a majority of the apostles and was passed by a Mormon legislature. It was vetoed by a Mormon governor, the principal reason for the veto being that the attempted legislation would bring about an amendment to the Constitution of the United States under which those guilty of the crime of polygamous cohabitation would be prosecuted and punished in the Federal courts.

Perhaps one of the most instructive instances of the exercise of the power of the Mormon Church in political affairs was in the matter referred to in the protest as the case of Moses Thatcher. In that case the testimony taken before the committee leaves no doubt that not far from the time when the leaders of the Mormon Church required their followers to divide between the two parties, it was ordered by the Mormon leaders that those officials of the church who desired to engage in politics in behalf of one of the political parties should go out and influence the people of the Mormon Church in favor of that party, while those who were of the contrary opinion should remain at home and not attempt to influence the members of that church to adopt their way of thinking. Mr. Thatcher saw fit to disobey this edict and not only to become a candidate for the United States Senate, but to go out among the people and endeavor to win converts to the party of which he was a member. For this offense against the political dictation of the first presidency and twelve apostles, Mr. Thatcher was deposed from his position as an apostle, deprived of all his offices in the Mormon Church, denied the privileges which are accorded to every Mormon in good standing, and the whole influence of the leaders of the Mormon Church was put forth to compass his defeat.

As was well said by Mr. Thatcher at the time of this occurrence, this action on the part of the ruling authorities of the church transformed the Mormon Church into a great political machine, the steering apparatus of which was in the hands of the twelve or fifteen men at the head. All this occurred because Mr. Thatcher refused to "take counsel"—that is, to follow the dictates of the Mormon Church as to who should become candidates for office and who should not become such.

Specific directions given by the heads of the Mormon Church to those under them seem to have varied according to circumstances. Several years ago, and before the admission of Utah into the Union as a State, it would appear that the apostles of the Mormon Church would convey to the members of that church instructions concerning their political action openly and in public addresses. The people would be told from the pulpits of the Mormon Church what ticket they ought to support.

As late as 1892 a bishop of the Mormon Church called together a number of the members of that church who belonged to a party opposing the party of the bishop, and told those whom he had thus called together that he had received a message from the first presidency to the effect that the candidate of the party to which the bishop belonged should be elected to Congress. In the same year and at the same election the president of the Mormon Church took occasion to write a letter to the bishops of his church indorsing the candidacy of a certain gentleman for Representative in Congress. In 1898 one of the apostles of the Mormon Church in a letter to one of the first presidents of seventies virtually advocated the election of a certain candidate for a seat in the United States Senate.

In 1902 an apostle of the Mormon Church went through one of the counties of Idaho, telling the Mormon voters that it was the will of the church that they should vote a certain ticket.

In later years the method of domination by the Mormon Church in political affairs has been, to a great extent, by means of a rule requiring those of any prominence in the church to "take counsel" before becoming candidates for public office. This virtually puts into the hands of the Mormon priesthood the filling of the various offices in the State. If the church takes to itself the right to decide who shall be the candidates for offices, there is no other choice left to either candidates or people. Under this rule the people can not vote for anyone who is a prominent member of the Mormon Church unless the ruling authorities of the church permit him to be a candidate. This rule thereby becomes a species of political usurpation, striking at the very foundation of our Government. Our entire political system is based on the theory that every voter has the right to vote for anyone he pleases, and that the people have a right to call upon whomsoever they will to represent them and to administer the affairs of the nation and of the Commonwealth. But the rule which has been promulgated and enforced by the officials of the Mormon Church precludes any member of that church from serving the nation or the State unless he has been designated for such service by the hierarchy which governs said church. This means that the State shall subsist in all things in and through the "counsel" of the church.

The pretext under which the leaders of the Mormon Church excuse their selection of candidates for public office is that it is a rule of the church designed to prevent high officials in the church from becoming engaged in public affairs to the neglect of their ecclesiastical functions.

This veil is too thin to conceal the real motives and designs of the Mormon priesthood. Were that the true reason for the adoption of the rule, it would be made to apply to all the higher officials of the Mormon Church under all circumstances and all would be prohibited from becoming candidates for public offices. And in such case the object of the rule would be attained by requiring of every church officer who becomes a candidate for public office that he resign his church office, and this without favor or distinction.

But the rule is not so framed or administered. Under this rule one may be a candidate for public office or may not be, according to the will of the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Mormon Church. Under the rule, as it is applied, one of the twelve apostles may be elected to the Senate (as in the case of Mr. SMOOT) or he may be defeated (as in the case of Mr. Thatcher). If one of the higher officials of the Mormon Church becomes a candidate for public office he may retain his official station in the church, as in the case of Mr. SMOOT and Mr. Roberts, or he may be broken of his office and deprived of his privileges in the church, as happened to Mr. Thatcher, these differing applications of the rule depending wholly on the will or caprice of the first presidency and the twelve apostles. Under this rule Mr. Roberts was defeated for the office of Representative in Congress and under the rule he was afterwards elected to the same office.

But the domination of the higher officials in the Mormon Church does not cease with the selection by them of a candidate for public office. It is a fact of no little importance in this case that where the Mormon Church is strong the candidates favored by the ruling authorities of that church are generally elected.

The fact that Gentiles are sometimes elected to office in preference to Mormons in localities where the Mormons are in the ascendency does not tend to prove the absence of church influence. It is shown by the testimony that the officials of the Mormon Church sometimes prefer one Mormon to another and sometimes prefer a Gentile to a Mormon. So well is it understood in Utah that the power of the Mormon Church in political affairs must be recognized and deferred to that in the election of Senators and of other officials the Mormons must be given what they claim as their share of the offices to be filled.

In order to realize the potency of the influence which the ruling authorities of the Mormon Church exercise in political affairs, it must be kept in mind that this influence proceeds from men who are believed by their followers to be oracles of God; that whatsoever they speak is the word of God; and that the first presidency of the Mormon Church and the council of the twelve apostles are "the mouthpiece of God." In the efforts put forth by the rulers of the church to defeat Moses Thatcher, the Mormon people were told that the first presidency and eleven of the apostles were inspired and that Moses Thatcher, the twelfth apostle, was not inspired.

The committee has not overlooked nor failed to give due consideration to the testimony of witnesses called in behalf of Mr. SMOOT, who testified that there was no interference by the Mormon Church in the political affairs of Utah or Idaho. But, leaving out of consideration any political or personal bias for Mr. SMOOT which those witnesses may have manifested, there is very little in their testimony aside from and beyond their individual opinion and judgment as regards the political conditions in the States named. The testimony of these witnesses in no way controverts the facts before referred to, from which facts the conclusion is irresistible that the controlling authorities of the Mormon Church do dominate the political affairs of the State of Utah and control to some extent the political affairs of the State of Idaho. Without disproof of these facts, or strong proof of countervailing facts, mere opinions of witnesses, however intelligent and however candid, do not suffice.

Not only is Mr. SMOOT one of those by and through whom the political affairs of Utah are dominated, but his election to the Senate was, it is believed, the result of such domination.

When Mr. SMOOT concluded to become a candidate for the Senate, he was careful to obtain the "consent" of the first presidency and twelve apostles to his candidacy. But this so-called "consent" of the rulers of the church was naturally regarded by the people of Utah, who were familiar with the ways of the Mormon high-priesthood, as being, under the circumstances, equivalent to an indorsement and made it impossible for anyone else to become an aspirant for the same position with any hope of success.

A PRACTICAL UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

The fact that the adherents of the Mormon Church hold the balance of power in politics in some of the States enables the first presidency and twelve apostles to control the political affairs of those States to any extent they may desire. Thus a complete union of church and State is formed. This is in accordance with the teachings of the priesthood of the Mormon Church, as promulgated in the writings of men of high authority in the church, to the effect that the church is supreme in all matters of Government, as well as in all things pertaining to the private life of the citizen. In one of a series of pamphlets, "On the Doctrines of the Gospel," by Apostle Orson Pratt, it is affirmed:

"The kingdom of God is an order of government established by divine authority. It is the only legal government that can exist in any part of the universe. All other governments are illegal and unauthorized. God having made all beings and worlds has the supreme right to govern them by His own laws and by officers of His own appointment. Any people attempting to govern themselves and by laws of their own making and by officers of their own appointment, are in direct rebellion against the kingdom of God." (Vol. 1, p. 666.)

The union of church and state in those States under the domination of the Mormon leaders is most abhorrent to our free institutions. John Adams declared that the attempt of the Church of England to extend its jurisdiction over the colonies "contributed as much as any other cause to arouse the attention, not only of the inquiring mind, but of the common people, and to urge them to close thinking of the constitutional authority of Parliament over the colonies" and to bring on the war of independence. After the colonies had achieved their independence, the complete enfranchisement of the church from the control of the state, and of the state from the control of the church was brought about through the efforts of men like Thomas Jefferson and James Madison in Virginia, and those of almost equal prominence in other States. And thus the natural desire of the people of this nation for the entire separation of church and state was incorporated in the Constitution of the United States by the first amendment to that instrument.

The right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience is one of the most sacred rights of every American citizen. No less sacred is the right of every citizen to vote according to his conscientious convictions without interference on the part of any church, religious organization, or body of ecclesiastics which seeks to control his political opinions or direct in any way his use of the elective franchise.

In the interest of religious freedom and to protect the State from the influence of the Mormon Church, the framers of the constitution of Utah incorporated in that instrument the provision which has been quoted in a preceding part of this report. That provision of the constitution of Utah has been persistently and contemptuously disregarded by the first presidency and the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church ever since Utah was admitted into the Union. They have paid as little regard to this mandate of the constitution of Utah as they have to the law which prohibits polygamy and the law which forbids polygamous cohabitation.

OATH OF VENGEANCE.

In the protest signed and verified by the oath of Mr. Leilich it is claimed that Mr. SMOOT has taken an oath as an apostle of the Mormon Church which is of such a nature as to render him incompetent to hold the office of Senator. From the testimony taken it appears that Mr. SMOOT has taken an obligation which is prescribed by the Mormon Church and administered to those who go through a ceremony known as "taking the endowments." It was testified by a number of witnesses who were examined during the investigation that one part of this obligation is expressed in substantially these words:

"You and each of you do covenant and promise that you will pray and never cease to pray Almighty God to avenge the blood of the prophets upon this nation, and that you will teach the same to your children and to your children's children unto the third and fourth generation."

An effort was made to destroy the effect of the testimony of three of these witnesses by impeachment of their reputation for veracity. This impeaching testimony was not strengthened by the fact that the witnesses by whom it was given were members of the Mormon Church, and would naturally disparage the truthfulness of one who would give testimony unfavorable to that church. The testimony of the witnesses for the protestants, before referred to, was corroborated by the testimony of Mr. Dougall, a witness sworn in behalf of Mr. SMOOT, and no attempt was made to impeach the character of this witness. It is true that a number of witnesses testified that no such obligation is contained in the endowment ceremony; but it is a very suspicious circumstance that every one of the witnesses who made this denial refused to state the obligation imposed on those who take part in the ceremony.

The evidence showing that such an obligation is taken is further supported by proof that during the endowment ceremonies a prayer is offered asking God to avenge the blood of Joseph Smith upon this nation, and certain verses from the Bible are read which are claimed to justify the obligation and the prayer. The fact that such a prayer if offered and that such passages from the Bible are read was not disputed by any witness who was sworn on the investigation. Nor was it questioned that by the term "the prophets" as used in the endowment ceremony reference is made to Joseph and Hyrum Smith.

That an obligation of vengeance is part of the endowment ceremony is further attested by the fact that shortly after testimony had been given on that subject before the committee Bishop Daniel Connelly of the Mormon Church denounced the witnesses who had given this testimony as traitors who had broken their oaths to the church.

The fact that an oath of vengeance is part of the endowment ceremonies and the nature and character of such oath was judicially determined in the third judicial court of Utah in the year 1889 in the matter of the application of John Moore and others to become citizens of the United States. In an opinion denying the application, the court say:

"In these applications the usual evidence on behalf of the applicants as to residence, moral character, etc., was introduced at a former hearing and was deemed sufficient. Objection was made, however, to the admission of John Moore and William J. Edgar upon the ground that they were members of the Mormon Church, and also because they had gone through the endowment house of that church and there had taken an oath or obligation incompatible with the oath of citizenship they would be required to take if admitted. * * *

"Those objecting to the right of these applicants to be admitted to citizenship introduced eleven witnesses who had been members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, commonly called the "Mormon Church." Several of these witnesses had held the position of bishop in the church, and all had gone through the endowment house and participated in its ceremonies. The testimony of these witnesses is to the effect that every member of the church is expected to go through the endowment house, and that nearly all do so; that marriages are usually solemnized there, and that those who are married elsewhere go through the endowment ceremonies at as early date thereafter as practicable in order that the marital relations shall continue throughout eternity.

"On behalf of the applicants fourteen witnesses testified concerning the endowment ceremonies, but all of them declined to state what oaths are taken, or what obligations or covenants are there entered into, or what penalties are attached to their violation; and these witnesses, when asked for their reason for declining to answer, stated that they did so 'on a point of honor,' while several stated they had forgotten what was said about avenging the blood of the prophets. * * *

"The witnesses for the applicants, while refusing to disclose the oaths, promises, and covenants of the endowment ceremonies and the penalties attached thereto, testified generally that there was nothing in the ceremonies inconsistent with loyalty to the Government of the United States, and that the Government was not mentioned. One of the objects of this investigation is to ascertain whether the oaths and obligations of the endowment house are incompatible with good citizenship, and it is not for applicants' witnesses to determine this question. The refusal of applicants' witnesses to state specifically what oath, obligations, or covenants are taken or entered into in the ceremonies renders their testimony of but little value, and tends to confirm rather than contradict the evidence on this point offered by the objectors. The evidence established beyond any reasonable doubt that the endowment ceremonies are inconsistent with the oath an applicant for citizenship is required to take, and that the oaths, obligations, or covenants there made or entered into are incompatible with the obligations and duties of citizens of the United States." (Vol. 4, pp. 340–343.)

The obligation hereinbefore set forth is an oath of disloyalty to the Government which the rules of the Mormon Church require, or at least encourage, every member of that organization to take.

It is in harmony with the views and conduct of the leaders of the Mormon people in former days, when they openly defied the Government of the United States, and is also in harmony with the conduct of those who give the law to the Mormon Church to-day in their defiant disregard of the laws against polygamy and polygamous cohabitation. It may be that many of those who take this obligation do so without realizing its treasonable import; but the fact that the first presidency and twelve apostles retain an obligation of that nature in the ceremonies of the church shows that at heart they are hostile to this nation and disloyal to its Government.

And the same spirit of disloyalty is manifested also in a number of the hymns contained in the collection of hymns put forth by the rulers of the Mormon Church to be sung by Mormon congregations.

There can be no question in regard to the taking of the oath of vengeance by Mr. SMOOT. He testified that he went through the ceremony of taking the endowments in the year 1880, and the head of the Mormon Church stated in his testimony that the ceremony is now the same that it has always been.

An obligation of the nature of the one before mentioned would seem to be wholly incompatible with the duty which Mr. SMOOT as a member of the United States Senate would owe to the nation. It is difficult to conceive how one could discharge the obligation which rests upon every Senator to so perform his official duties as to promote the welfare of the people of the United States and at the same time be calling down the vengeance of heaven on this nation because of the killing of the founders of the Mormon Church sixty years ago.

MR. SMOOT NOT ENTITLED TO A SEAT IN THE SENATE.

The more deliberately and carefully the testimony taken on the investigation is considered, the more irresistibly it leads to the conclusion that the facts stated in the protest are true; that Mr. SMOOT is one of a self-perpetuating body of men, known as the first presidency and twelve apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, commonly known as the Mormon Church; that these men claim divine authority to control the members of said church in all things, temporal as well as spiritual; that this authority is, and has been for several years past, so exercised by the said first presidency and twelve apostles as to encourage the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation in the State of Utah and elsewhere, contrary to the constitution and laws of the State of Utah and the law of the land; that the said first presidency and twelve apostles do now control, and for a long time past have controlled, the political affairs of the State of Utah, and have thus brought about in said State a union of church and state, contrary to the constitution of said State of Utah and contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and that said REED SMOOT comes here, not as the accredited representative of the State of Utah in the Senate of the United States, but as the choice of the hierarchy which controls the church and has usurped the functions of the State in said State of Utah.

It follows, as a necessary conclusion from these facts, that Mr. SMOOT is not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Utah, and your committee report the following resolution:

Resolved, That REED SMOOT is not entitled to a seat as a Senator of the United States from the State of Utah.

J. C. BURROWS, Chairman.

[Senate Report No. 4253, part 2, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, having had under consideration Senate resolution No. 205, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, adopted January 27, 1903, being unable to agree with the majority of the committee, submit the following minority report.

They attach hereto and make a part hereof a full statement of the case, showing all charges affecting or intending to affect the right and title of REED SMOOT to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Utah, together with an abstract of all the material, relevant, and competent testimony offered with respect thereto, and their conclusions deduced therefrom.

They ask that the same may be printed for purposes of reference as a part of this report, and respectfully refer to the same as a more complete statement of the following findings and propositions, and the testimony and arguments in support of the same, upon which they base their dissent from the conclusions and report of the majority of the committee:

I.

REED SMOOT possesses all the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution to make him eligible to a seat in the Senate, and the regularity of his election by the legislature of the State of Utah is not questioned in any manner.

II.

Aside from his connection with the Mormon Church, so far as his private character is concerned, it is, according to all the witnesses, irreproachable, for all who testify on the subject agree or concede that he has led and is leading an upright life, entirely free from immoral practices of every kind. He is not a polygamist; has never had but one wife, and has been noted from early manhood for his opposition to plural marriages, and probably did as much as any other member of the Mormon Church to bring about the prohibition of further plural marriages.

III.

So far as mere belief and membership in the Mormon Church are concerned, he is fully within his rights and privileges under the guaranty of religious freedom given by the Constitution of the United States, for there is no statutory provision, and could not be, prohibiting either such belief or such membership.

Moreover, having special reference to the Mormons residing in Utah and their peculiar belief, it was provided in the act of Congress passed July 16, 1894, that the people of Utah should provide in their constitution "by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said States—

"1. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitants of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship: Provided, That polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited."

In consequence there was embodied in the constitution of the State of Utah a compliance with this requirement, and thereupon the Territory was duly admitted as a State of the Union.

Accordingly, members of the Mormon Church, open and avowed believers in its doctrines and teachings, have been admitted without question to both Houses of Congress as Representatives of the State.

IV.

There remain but two grounds on which the right or title of REED SMOOT to his seat in the Senate is contested. They are:

1. That he is shown to have taken what is spoken of in the record as the "endowment oath," by which he obligated himself to make his allegiance to the church paramount to his allegiance to the United States; and

2. That by reason of his official relation to the church, as one of its apostles, he is responsible for polygamous cohabitation which yet continues among the Mormons, notwithstanding it is prohibited by law.

As to the "endowment oath," it is sufficient in this summary to say that the testimony is collated and analyzed in the annexed statement, and thereby shown to be limited in amount, vague and indefinite in character, and utterly unreliable, because of the disreputable and untrustworthy character of the witnesses.

There were but seven witnesses who made any pretenses of testifying about any such obligation. One of these was shown by the testimony of two uncontradicted witnesses to be mentally unsound. Another, to have committed perjury in the testimony given before the committee on another point. The third was shown by the uncontradicted testimony of a number of witnesses to have a bad reputation for truth and veracity, and to be thoroughly unreliable. A fourth admitted that he had been for years intemperate, and was shown by indisputable testimony to have lost his position on that account, and thereupon and for that reason to have withdrawn from the church and to have assumed such a hostile and revengeful attitude as to entirely discredit him as a reliable witness. The other three witnesses were so indefinite as to their statements that their testimony amounted at most to nothing more than an attempt to state an imperfect and confessedly uncertain recollection.

All that it is attempted to show as to the character of this oath is positively contradicted by REED SMOOT and a great number of witnesses, whose standing and character and whose reputation for truth and veracity are unquestioned, except only in so far as their credibility may be affected by the fact that they are or have been members of the Mormon Church.

Upon this state of evidence we are of opinion that no ground has been established on which to predicate a finding or belief that Mr. SMOOT ever took any obligation involving hostility to the United States, or requiring him to regard his allegiance to the Mormon Church as paramount to his allegiance and duty to the United States.

V.

The only remaining question is whether or not by virtue of his official relation to the church as one of its apostles he has any responsibility for the continuation of polygamous cohabitation by members of that church.

The testimony on this point is also carefully collated and analyzed in the annexed statement.

It will be found by an examination of that testimony that he has never at any time, and particularly he has not since the manifesto of 1890, countenanced or encouraged plural marriages; but that, on the contrary, he has uniformly upheld the policy of the church, as announced by that proclamation, by actively advocating and exerting his influence to effect a complete discontinuance of such marriages, and that in the few instances established by the testimony where plural marriages and polygamous cohabitation, as a result of them, have occurred since 1890 they have been without any encouragement, countenance, or approval whatever on his part.

As to polygamous cohabitation in consequence of plural marriages entered into before the manifesto of 1890, there is no testimony to show that he has ever done more than silently acquiesce in this offense against law. In view of his important and influential position in the church, this acquiescence might be regarded as inexcusable if it were not for the peculiar circumstances attending the commission of this offense.

To understand these circumstances it is necessary to recall some historical facts, among which are some that indicate that the United States Government is not free from responsibility for these violations of the law. Instead of discountenancing and prohibiting polygamy when it was first proclaimed and practiced the Congress remained silent and did nothing in that behalf. While Congress was thus at least manifesting indifference, President Fillmore and the Senate of the United States, in September, 1850, gave both recognition and encouragement by the appointment and confirmation of Brigham Young, the then head of the church, and an open and avowed advocate and representative of polygamy, to be governor of the Territory of Utah. When his term of office expired under this appointment he was reappointed by President Pierce and again confirmed by the Senate.

There was no legislation or action of any kind by Congress on this subject until the act of July 1, 1862, which was in language, as well as legal effect, nothing more than a prohibition of bigamy in the Territories and other places over which the United States had jurisdiction.

After this act, for a period of twenty years, plural marriages and polygamous cohabitation continued in the Territory of Utah practically unrestrained and without any serious effort on the part of the United States to restrict the same.

Finally, in response to an aroused public sentiment, Congress passed the act of March 22, 1882, by which it prohibited both plural marriages and polygamous cohabitation, but legitimized the children of all such marriages born prior to the 1st day of January, 1883. Under this act prosecutions were inaugurated to enforce its provisions, but it was soon demonstrated that public sentiment was such that only partial and very unsatisfactory success could be secured.

Then followed what is known as the "Edmunds-Tucker Act" of March 3, 1887, by which, among other things, the rules of evidence were so changed as to make it less difficult to secure evidence in prosecutions for polygamy and polygamous cohabitation. Again, by the terms of this act all the children born within twelve months after its passage were legitimized.

This statute was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, and efforts to prosecute such offenses were redoubled, with such success that on the 26th day of September, 1890, the then president of the church, Wilford Woodruff, issued what is known as the "manifesto of 1890," forbidding further plural marriages. So far as the testimony discloses, there have been but few plural marriages since, perhaps not more than the bigamous marriages during the same period among the same number of non-Mormons.

The evidence shows that there were at this time about 2,400 polygamous families in the Territory of Utah. This number was reduced to five hundred and some odd families in 1905. A few of these families may have removed out of the State of Utah, but so far as the testimony discloses, the great reduction in number has been on account of the deaths of the heads of these families. It will be only a few years at most until all will have passed away. This feature of the situation has had a controlling influence upon public sentiment in the State of Utah with respect to the prosecutions for polygamous cohabitation since the manifesto of 1890.

Whether right or wrong, when plural marriages were stopped and the offense of polygamy was confined to the cohabitation of those who had contracted marriages before 1890, and particularly those who had contracted marriages before the statutes of 1887 and 1882, the disinclination to prosecute for these offenses became so strong, even among the non-Mormons, that such prosecutions were finally practically abandoned.

It was not alone the fact that if no further plural marriages were to be contracted polygamy would necessarily in the course of time die out and pass away, but also the fact that Congress having, by the statutes of 1882 and 1887, specifically legitimized the children of these polygamous marriages, it was inconsistent, if not unwise and impossible, in the opinion of even the non-Mormons, to prohibit the father of such children from living with, supporting, educating, and caring for them; but if the father was thus to live with, support, educate, and care for the children, it seemed harsh and unreasonable to exclude from this relationship the mothers of the children.

Such are some of the reasons assigned for the lack of a public sentiment to uphold successful prosecutions for polygamous cohabitation after 1890. It is unnecessary to recite others, for it is enough to say that whatever the real reason or explanation may be, the fact was that after 1890 it became practically impossible to enforce the law against these offenses, except in flagrant cases.

Such was the situation when the Territory applied for admission to the Union and Congress passed the enabling act of July 16, 1894, by which the people of Utah, in order to entitle them to admission into the Union, on terms prescribed by Congress, were required to incorporate in their constitution a proviso that "polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited;" not polygamous cohabitation, it will be observed, but only polygamous marriages. The testimony shows that there was a common understanding both in Congress and Utah that there were not only to be no more plural marriages, but that prosecutions for polygamous cohabitation had become so difficult that there was a practical suspension of them, and that time was the only certain solution of the perplexing problem.

This sentiment has not only ever since continued, but with the constant diminution of the number of polygamous families and the rapid approach of the time when all will have passed away there has come a natural strengthening of the sentiment. The testimony in this respect is set forth at length in the annexed statement, but we make the following quotations in order that it may appear in this summary that there is this common disposition, among non-Mormons as well as Mormons.

Judge William McCarthy of the supreme court of Utah, a non-Mormon and an uncompromising opponent of polygamy, who has held many important offices of trust, among others that of assistant United States attorney for Utah, and who, as such, was charged with the duty of prosecuting these offenses, testified as follows:

"I prosecuted them (offenses of polygamous cohabitation) before the United States commissioners up until 1893, when the United States attorney refused to allow my accounts for services for that kind of work, and then I quit and confined my investigations before the grand jury in those cases."

In explanation of his action he testified—we quote from the annexed statement:

"That he found the press was against the prosecutions; that the public prosecutor, whose attention he invited to the matter, refused to proceed. From this and other facts which came to his knowledge, Judge McCarthy reached the conclusion that the public sentiment was against interfering with men in their polygamous relations who had married before the manifesto."

E. B. Critchlow, a non-Mormon attorney at law of Salt Lake City, one of the principal managers of this proceeding against Mr. SMOOT, who gave the case his personal attention, attending most of the meetings of committee, testified before the committee, again quoting from annexed statement:

"That after the manifesto of 1890 there was no inclination on the part of the prosecuting officer to 'push these matters as to present cohabitation,' 'thinking it was a matter that would immediately die out;' that it was well known that Apostle John Henry Smith was living in unlawful cohabitation; that non-Mormons generally made no objection to it; that they were disposed 'to let things go,' and that that was the general feeling from the time of the manifesto in 1890 'down to very recent times—pretty nearly up to date, or practically up to date.'"

Mr. Critchlow further testified that the non-Mormons were disposed to overlook the continuous polygamous cohabitation of those who had taken plural wives before the manifesto, because they, the non-Mormons, felt satisfied that there would be no more plural marriages; that the thing would work itself out in the future, and that where the polygamists had their wives in separate houses and simply kept up the old relations without the offensive flaunting of them before the public, it had been practically passed over.

Orlando W. Powers, esq., a leading lawyer of Utah, who was associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory, and who showed by his testimony much hostility to the Mormon Church, testified that there was this general feeling after the manifesto not to interfere with those whose marriages were prior thereto. He then added, "There is a question for statesmen to solve. We have not known what was best to do. It has been discussed, and people would say that such and such a man ought to be prosecuted.

"Then they would consider whether anything would be gained; whether we would not delay instead of hastening the time that we hope to live to see; whether the institution would not flourish by reason of what they would term persecution. And so, notwithstanding a protest has been sent down here to you, I will say to you, the people have acquiesced in the condition that exists."

He explained that by "the people" he meant the Gentiles.

The following quotation from a speech by Senator DUBOIS, reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 5, 1903, page 1729 et seq., is to the same general effect:

"Mr. DUBOIS. * * * Various causes operated to cause the Mormons to abandon polygamy. There was a feeling among the younger members of the Mormon Church, and a very strong feeling, that polygamy should be done away with. So here was this pressure within the church against polygamy and the pressure by the Government from outside the church against polygamy. In 1891, I think it was, the president of the Mormon Church issued a manifesto declaring that thereafter there should be no polygamous marriages anywhere in the Mormon Church. The Mormons were then called together in one of their great conferences, where they meet by the thousands. This manifesto was issued to them by the first presidency, which is their authority; was submitted to them, and all the Mormon people ratified and agreed to this manifesto, doing away with polygamy thereafter.

"The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will recall that I came here as a Senator from Idaho shortly after that, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] will recall how bitter and almost intemperate I was in my language before his committee and on the floor of the other House in the denunciation of these practices of the Mormon Church. But after that manifesto was issued, in common with all of the Gentiles of that section who had made this fight, we said: 'They have admitted the right of our contention and say now, like children who have been unruly, we will obey our parents and those who have a right to guide us; we will do those things no more.' Therefore we could not maintain our position and continue punishing them unless it was afterwards demonstrated that they would not comply with their promise.

"After a few years in Idaho, where the fight was the hottest and the thickest, we wiped all of those laws from our statute books which aimed directly at the Mormon people, and to-day the laws on the statute books of Idaho against polygamy and kindred crimes are less stringent than in almost any other State in the Union. I live among those people; and, so far as I know, in Idaho there has not been a polygamous marriage celebrated since that manifesto was issued, and I have yet to find a man in Idaho or anywhere else who will say that a polygamous marriage has been celebrated anywhere since the issuance of that manifesto.

"Mr. HALE. Then it must follow from that, as the years go by and as the older people disappear, polygamy as a practice will be practically removed.

"Mr. DUBOIS. There is no question about it; and I will say to the Senator, owing to the active part which we took in that fierce contest in Idaho, I with others who had made that fight thought we were justified in making this promise to the Mormon people.

"We had no authority of law, but we took it upon ourselves to assure them that those older men who were living in the polygamous relation, who had growing families which they had reared and were rearing before the manifesto was issued, and at a time when they thought they had a right under the Constitution to enter into polygamous relations—that those older men and women and their children should not be disturbed; that the polygamous man should be allowed to support his numerous wives and their children.

"The polygamous relations, of course, should not continue, but would not compel a man to turn his families adrift. We promised that the older ones, who had contracted those relations before the manifesto was issued, would not be persecuted by the Gentiles; that time would be given for them to pass away, but that the law would be strenuously enforced against any polygamous marriage which might be contracted in the future."

Much more testimony might be quoted of the same general character. It is sufficient, however, for the purpose of this summary to say that there is practically no testimony in conflict with that which has been quoted.

In other words, the conditions existing in Utah since REED SMOOT became an official of the Mormon Church in 1900 have been such that non-Mormons and Mormons alike have acquiesced in polygamous cohabitation on the part of those who married before the manifesto of 1890, as an evil that could best be gotten rid of by simply tolerating it until in the natural course of events it shall have passed out of existence.

With this disposition prevailing everywhere in the State of Utah among all classes—the Gentile or non-Mormon population as well as among the Mormons—the undersigned are of the opinion that there is no just ground for expelling Senator SMOOT or for finding him disqualified to hold the seat he occupies because of the fact that he, in common with all the people of his State, has not made war upon, but has acquiesced in, a condition for which he had no original responsibility. In doing so he has only conformed to what non-Mormons, hostile to his church, as well as Mormons, have concluded is, under all the circumstances, not only the wisest course to pursue, but probably the only course that promises effective and satisfactory results.

Statement.

The minority respectfully submit the following statement as a part of their foregoing report:

January 27, 1903, the Senate adopted the following Senate Resolution No. 205:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate the right and title of REED SMOOT to a sent in the Senate as Senator from the State of Utah, and said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expense of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee."

At the time of the adoption of this resolution there were pending in the Senate two formal protests against the admission of REED SMOOT to the Senate, both having been filed before he took his seat. One of these protests is signed by W. M. Paden and seventeen others, and the other by John L. Leilich alone, Mr. Leilich being also one of the seventeen who signed the principal protest.

Shortly before the adoption of the foregoing resolution at a preliminary hearing on the 16th day of January, 1903, of which notice was duly given, counsel appeared before the committee representing Mr. Paden and others who signed the principal protest, and Mr. SMOOT also appeared in person and by counsel. At that time statements were made by counsel for the respective parties stating in a general way what they expected to prove and what their claims were as to the legal aspects of the case. Later the taking of testimony commenced.

Numerous witnesses were produced and examined before the committee, both on behalf of the protestants and on behalf of Mr. SMOOT. The taking of this evidence was continued from time to time until the 25th day of January, 1905, when the further taking of testimony was closed and counsel were heard in argument. The committee took the case under consideration with a view to making a report. Afterwards, at the present session, the case was reopened for the further taking of testimony, after which the case was again argued by counsel.

In the protest signed by Mr. Leilich alone it was charged that REED SMOOT is a polygamist, and that, as an apostle of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, commonly called the "Mormon Church," he had taken an oath "of such a nature and character as that he is thereby disqualified from taking the oath of office required of a United States Senator." No one appeared, however, to sustain either of these charges. No evidence has been offered in support of either of them, but, on the contrary, both charges were refuted by a number of witnesses.

The investigation made by the committee has been based chiefly upon the charges made in the protest signed by Mr. Paden and others.

At the preliminary hearing already referred to, counsel for the protestants presented, in a more formal way than had been done in the protest itself, the charges supposed to be embodied in that protest.

The charges thus presented are as follows:

First. The Mormon priesthood, according to the doctrine of that church and the belief and practice of its membership, is vested with, and assumes to exercise, supreme authority in all things temporal and spiritual, civil and political. The head of the church claims to receive divine revelations, and these REED SMOOT, by his covenants and obligations, is bound to accept and obey, whether they affect things spiritual or things temporal.

Second. The first presidency and twelve apostles, of whom REED SMOOT is one, are supreme in the exercise of this authority of the church and in the transmission of that authority to their successors. Each of them is called prophet, seer, and revelator.

Third. As shown by their teaching and by their own lives, this body of men has not abandoned belief in polygamy and polygamous cohabitation. On the contrary—

(a) As the ruling authorities of the church they promulgate in the most solemn manner the doctrine of polygamy without reservation.

(b) The president of the Mormon Church and a majority of the twelve apostles now practice polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, and some of them have taken polygamous wives since the manifesto of 1890. These things have been done with the knowledge and countenance of REED SMOOT. Plural-marriage ceremonies have been performed by apostles since the manifesto of 1890, and many bishops and other high officials of the church have taken plural wives since that time. All of the first presidency and twelve apostles encourage, countenance, conceal, and connive at polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, and honor and reward by high office and distinguished preferment those who most persistently and defiantly violate the law of the land.

Fourth. Though pledged by the compact and bound by the law of their Commonwealth, this supreme body, whose voice is law to its people and whose members were individually directly responsible for good faith to the American people, permitted, without protest or objection, their legislators to pass a law nullifying the statute against polygamous cohabitation.

In substance these charges, so far as they seem to be a proper subject of inquiry here, are:

1. That the Mormon Church exacts and receives from its members, including REED SMOOT, absolute obedience in all political matters.

2. That the Mormon Church is promulgating the doctrine of polygamy, and that the first presidency and all the twelve apostles, including REED SMOOT, "encourage, countenance, conceal, and connive at polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, and reward those who practice it."

No evidence has been submitted to the committee or has come to its knowledge in anywise affecting injuriously the general character of REED SMOOT. On the contrary, it has been admitted by the protestants, through their counsel, and a number of witnesses on both sides have testified, that his moral character is unimpeachable in every respect. In the protest of Mr. Paden and others it is explicitly stated that they do not charge him with any offense cognizable by law.

SOME HISTORICAL FACTS.

To a proper understanding of the voluminous evidence in the case, in so far as it tends to throw any light upon the question whether REED SMOOT is entitled to retain his seat in the Senate, it will be useful to set forth, in a preliminary way, certain indisputable historical facts.

The Mormon people, under the lead of Brigham Young, in their pilgrimage from Nauvoo, Ill., settled at the place now known as Salt Lake City in the summer of 1847. The place where they located was, at that time, Mexican territory. The Mormons, however, hoisted the Stars and Stripes on an eminence near the city, ever since called Ensign Peak.

On the 20th day of September, 1850, Brigham Young, the then head of the Mormon Church, was nominated for governor of the Territory of Utah by President Fillmore, and his appointment was confirmed by the Senate September 28, 1850. During his term of office under that appointment, and in the year 1852, Brigham Young, as the president of the Mormon Church, formally and publicly proclaimed polygamy as a doctrine of that church.

There is some dispute as to whether polygamy had not been proclaimed in 1844 by Joseph Smith, jr., Brigham Young's predecessor as president of the church; but it is not deemed necessary in this statement to consider the merits of that controversy. The admitted fact is that from the time of Brigham Young's announcement in 1852 polygamy was openly practiced in Utah by many of the Mormon people, including Brigham Young himself.

When his term of office as governor of the Territory expired in 1854 he was appointed for another term of four years by President Pierce, his nomination being again confirmed by the Senate; he served out his second full term of four years. During all of this time he continued to be president of the church and to openly live in polygamous relations with several wives.

ACT OF 1862.

There seems to have been no attempt by the Government of the United States to interfere with the practice of polygamy in Utah until July 1, 1862, on which date an act of Congress entitled "An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Utah," became a law (12 Stat. L., 501).

The first section of that act is as follows:

"That every person having a husband or wife living, who shall marry any other person, whether married or single, in a Territory of the United States, or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall, except in the cases specified in the proviso to this section, be adjudged guilty of bigamy, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years: Provided, nevertheless, That this section shall not extend to any person by reason of any former marriage whose husband or wife by such marriage shall have been absent for five successive years without being known to such person within that time to be living; nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been dissolved by the decree of a competent court; nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been annulled or pronounced void by the sentence or decree of a competent court on the ground of the nullity of the marriage contract."

It will be observed that while this section of the act of 1862 made it a penal offense to take a plural wife or husband it did not punish or in any wise interfere with the continued cohabitation of those who had previously entered into the polygamous relation.

THE EDMUNDS LAW.

Such cohabitation was not made an offense until March 22, 1882, when the so-called "Edmunds Act" became a law (22 Stat. L., 30). This act of 1882 amended the act of July 1, 1862 (which in the meantime had become section 5352 of the Revised Statutes). Section 3 of the amendatory act provided:

"SEC. 3. That if any male person, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court."

In the seventh section of the same act it was provided as follows:

"SEC. 7. That the issue of bigamous or polygamous marriages, known as "Mormon marriages," in cases in which such marriages have been solemnized according to the ceremonies of the Mormon sect, in any Territory of the United States, and such issue shall have been born before the 1st day of January, A. D. 1883, are herby legitimated."

Soon after the Edmunds Act became a law prosecutions were instituted in the Territorial courts against persons who were living in polygamy, those prosecutions being nearly all under the third section of the act, which made it an offense for a man to cohabit with more than one woman. From that time until October, 1890, the number of polygamous marriages in Utah decreased, but the practice was not entirely stopped.

THE EDMUNDS-TUCKER ACT.

By what is called the Edmunds-Tucker Act, approved March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 635), the rules of evidence were changed so as to make a lawful husband or wife of a person accused of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation a competent witness.

By section 7 of that act the various acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Utah incorporating or continuing the corporation known as the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" were disapproved and annulled, and that corporation dissolved; and it was further made the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to take proper proceedings in the supreme court of the Territory to wind up the affairs of the corporation. Section 11 of this act of 1887 further provided as follows:

"SEC. 11. That the laws enacted by the legislative assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide for or recognize the capacity of illegitimate children to inherit or to be entitled to any distributive share in the estate of the father of any such illegitimate child are hereby disapproved and annulled; and no illegitimate child shall hereafter be entitled to inherit from his or her father or to receive any distributive share in the estate of his or her father: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any illegitimate child born within twelve months after the passage of this act, nor to any child made legitimate by the seventh section of the act entitled 'An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes,' approved March 22, 1882."

REYNOLDS V. THE UNITED STATES.

Although the act of 1862, above referred to, made it a criminal offense to marry a plural wife in the Territories of the United States, and although polygamy was openly and publicly practiced, there seems to have been little effort on the part of the Government to suppress it in Utah for many years after that time. Finally, however, one George Reynolds was indicted and charged with bigamy under that act, and his case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The principal question involved was whether, since polygamy was a duty under the religious doctrines of the Mormon Church, an act of Congress punishing the taking of a plural wife was an unconstitutional interference with religion. That case was decided at the October term, 1878 (Reynolds v. United States, 97 U. S., 145). The court held that while it was not competent for Congress to make a mere belief a punishable offense, yet it was entirely competent for it to make criminal an act which the person committing it might consider to be a duty under his religious belief.

It is worthy of note that the belief of the Mormons in the unconstitutionality of the act in question was so strong that Reynolds, a member of the church, voluntarily enabled proof of his offense to be obtained in order that the constitutionality of the act might be tested.

THE MANIFESTO OF 1890.

On the 26th of September, 1890, Wilford Woodruff, then president of the Mormon Church, issued what is called "The manifesto," of which the following is a copy:

OFFICIAL DECLARATION.

To whom it may concern:

Press dispatches having been sent for political purposes from Salt Lake City, which have been widely published, to the effect that the Utah Commission, in their recent report to the Secretary of the Interior, allege that plural marriages are still being solemnized, and that forty or more such marriages have been contracted in Utah since last June, or during the past year; also that in public discourses the leaders of the church have taught, encouraged, and urged the continuance of the practice of polygamy;

I, therefore, as president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, do hereby, in the most solemn manner, declare that these charges are false. We are not teaching polygamy, or plural marriage, nor permitting any person to enter into its practice, and I deny that either forty or any other number of plural marriages have during that period been solemnized in our temples or in any other place in the Territory.

One case has been reported in which the parties alleged that the marriage was performed in the endowment house, in Salt Lake City, in the spring of 1899, but I have not been able to learn who performed the ceremony; whatever was done in this matter was without my knowledge. In consequence of this alleged occurrence the endowment house was, by my instructions, taken down without delay.

Inasmuch as laws have been enacted by Congress forbidding plural marriages, which laws have been pronounced constitutional by the court of last resort, I hereby declare my intention to submit to those laws and to use my influence with the members of the church over which I preside to have them do likewise.

There is nothing in my teachings to the church or in those of my associates during the time specified which can be reasonably construed to inculcate or encourage polygamy, and when any elder of the church has used language which appeared to convey any such teachings he has been promptly reproved. And I now publicly declare that my advice to the Latter-Day Saints is to refrain from contracting any marriage forbidden by the law of the land.

WILFORD WOODRUFF,
President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

At the semiannual general conference of the members of the Mormon Church, which was held on October 6, 1890, the foregoing declaration was unanimously accepted "as authoritative and binding." Two years later it was again approved by the general conference of the church. Since it was first approved by the general conference, in October, 1890, it has been and still remains a part of the fundamental law of the Mormon Church, which can be repealed or modified only by the action of a similar conference.

As to the effect of the manifesto on the power of the president of the Mormon Church, or any subordinate official, to celebrate a plural marriage, we quote a part of the testimony of James E. Talmage, Doctor Talmage prepared and issued, under the auspices of the church authorities, a work called "Articles of Faith," which authoritatively sets forth the doctrines of the church, having been submitted to, approved by, and published by the church itself. (Vol. III, pp. 47 and 48.)

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Doctor, you have used the expression here "holding the keys" in connection with that revelation involving polygamy, when it was given to Joseph Smith, jr., that he was the only man who held the keys to that power. He only at that time, or some person delegated by him, could make a plural marriage that would be valid according to the laws of the church. Am I right in that?

"Mr. TALMAGE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. From that time on down to the time that President Woodruff issued this manifesto, which the church approved in conference assembled, the same principle obtained?

"Mr. TALMAGE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. That a plural marriage could not be valid according to the law of the church, only when celebrated by the president or by somebody authorized by him to celebrate it. Is that right?

"Mr. TALMAGE. That is strictly true.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Then when this revelation, which is called the 'manifesto,' came and it was submitted to the people and accepted by them, that power was taken away from the president, was it not?

"Mr. TALMAGE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. So that since the 6th of October, 1890, the president of the church had no power to solemnize a plural marriage according to the law of the church, even?

"Mr. TALMAGE. That is true.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. And no power to authorize anybody else to celebrate one?

"Mr. TALMAGE. That is true.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. So that if any person has undertaken to enter into plural marriage, if any woman has become the plural wife of a husband since the 6th day of October, 1890, she is no more a wife by the law of the church than she is by the law of the land?

"Mr. TALMAGE. That is true.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. And it is not in the power of the president to revive the old system so that he can make a valid plural marriage or authorize one, unless he does it through the general conference of the church?

"Mr. TALMAGE. Certainly. It is now a rule of the church that that power shall not be exercised. The power is there, but the exercise of it is entirely stopped, and a rule of the church thus made and sanctioned is equally binding with the law founded upon revelation, and the president therefore has in one sense, half voluntarily, inasmuch as he was the chief individual to bring it before the conference, but by the action of the conference, properly speaking, has surrendered that power as far as its exercise is concerned.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. It takes the action of the people to restore it, does it not?

"Mr. TALMAGE. Most assuredly——." (3—48, 49.)

THE ENABLING ACT.

The enabling act, under which Utah, in January, 1896, was finally admitted into the Union, was passed by Congress on July 16, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 107). By section 3 of that act it was required that the State convention, which was authorized to be called to organize the State government, should provide:

"By ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said States—

"First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship: Provided, That polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited.'"

It is very important to observe that while this act made it a condition to the admission of the State that polygamous or plural marriages should not be allowed, no provision of any kind was made against polygamous cohabitation. That offense was left to be governed by the constitution and laws of the State as the inhabitants of the State might determine.

The testimony shows that the distinction thus made by Congress in the enabling act between polygamous marriages and polygamous cohabitation was intentional. Polygamous marriages, as we have seen, were not forbidden by any act of Congress until 1862, ten years after polygamy had become prevalent in Utah. It was twenty years later still, 1882, before Congress prohibited polygamous cohabitation.

From the time polygamy was first promulgated by Brigham Young, as president of the Mormon Church, until about five years thereafter, he was continued in office by the Government as governor of the Territory. Both the Edmunds Act of 1882 and the Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887 recognized polygamous marriages to the extent of making legitimate all the children born of such marriages prior to the passage of those acts, respectively, who might be born within a period in one case of nine months and nine days and in the other twelve months after the passage of the act.

POLYGAMOUS COHABITATION.

Under these laws families had been created, and children born of polygamous marriages had grown to manhood and womanhood. It is not surprising, under such circumstances, that there was a feeling on the part both of the Government officials in that Territory and of the people of the Territory that if further polygamous marriages should cease the continuance of polygamous relations theretofore created might be tolerated, if they were not openly or flauntingly carried on.

To prohibit such relations would be to deny the parents of legitimated children to dwell together with such children. Some twenty-five or thirty witnesses have been examined on this subject, most of them non-Mormons and several of them witnesses called on behalf of the protestants. There is a practical unanimity among them that at least from the time of the admission of the State into the Union, which occurred on January 4, 1896, there was practically a universal disinclination to prosecute those who had plural families born of relations established before the manifesto of 1890.

As a sample of the evidence on this subject we refer to the testimony of Judge William M. McCarty, one of the associate justices of the supreme court of Utah. He was assistant United States attorney for the Territory of Utah from 1889 until 1902, when he was elected county attorney of Sevier County, in that Territory. He was reelected in 1894. In 1895 he was elected one of the district judges of the State of Utah.

He was reelected to that office in 1900, and in 1902 was elected to his present office. He is a non-Mormon, and has always been an uncompromising opponent of polygamy. He conducted some of the prosecutions for polygamous cohabitation between the date of the manifesto, in 1890, and the admission of the State into the Union in January, 1896. He testified:

"I prosecuted them before the United States commissioners up until 1893, when the United States attorney refused to allow my accounts for services for that kind of work, and then I quit and confined my investigations before the grand jury in those cases."

And Judge McCarty further testified that the superior to whom he referred as stopping the prosecution for polygamous cohabitation was John W. Judd, a Gentile.

In 1897 some prosecutions for polygamous cohabitations against men who were married before the manifesto came before Judge McCarty as district judge of the State. The accused in those cases admitted their guilt and were punished by a fine only, upon agreeing to cease cohabitation with their plural wives. Judge McCarty testified that it was after these prosecutions he obtained the first emphatic expression he had observed as to the state of public opinion in Utah at that time regarding such prosecutions.

He said that he found the press was against such prosecutions; that the public prosecutor, whose attention he invited to the matter, refused to proceed. From this and other facts which came to his knowledge Judge McCarty reached the conclusion that the public sentiment of the State was against interfering with men in their polygamous relations who had married before the manifesto. (Vol. 2, 882 to 886, 889, 916.)

E. B. Critchlow, a Gentile lawyer, of Salt Lake City, who prepared the principal protests in this case and who, during the early sittings of the committee, assisted Mr. Tayler, counsel for the protestants, in presenting their case, testified as a witness on behalf of the protestants that after the manifesto of 1890 there was no inclination on the part of the prosecuting officer to "push these matters as to present cohabitation," "thinking it was a matter that would immediately die out;" that it was well known that Apostle John Henry Smith was living in unlawful cohabitation; that non-Mormons generally made no objection to it; that they were disposed "to let things go," and that that was the general feeling from the time of the manifesto in 1890 "down to very recent times—pretty nearly up to date or practically up to date."

Mr. Critchlow further testified that the non-Mormons were disposed to overlook the continuous polygamous cohabitation of those who had taken plural wives before the manifesto, because they—the non-Mormons—felt satisfied that there would be no more plural marriages; that the thing would work itself out in the future, and that where the polygamists had their wives in separate houses and simply kept up the old relations without the offensive flaunting of them before the public it had been practically passed over. (Vol. 1, 624, 625.)

Another witness called on behalf of the protestants was Orlando W. Powers, a leading lawyer of Utah, a non-Mormon, who was associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah in 1885 and 1886, and whose testimony in general shows his strong feeling against the Mormon Church. He testified that, speaking for those who fought the church party in the days when it was a power, they had felt and still feel that if the church would stop new plural marriages, those who had contracted such marriages before the manifesto would not be interfered with. After stating that the people who lived in the East had no understanding of the situation in this regard in Utah, Judge Powers added:

"That condition exists. There is a question for statesmen to solve. We have not known what was best to do. It has been discussed, and people would say that such and such a man ought to be prosecuted. Then they would consider whether anything would be gained; whether we would not delay instead of hastening the time that we hope to live to see; whether the institution would not flourish by reason of what they would term persecutions. And so, notwithstanding a protest has been sent down here to you, I will say to you the people have acquiesced in the condition that exists."

Then the witness added that by "the people" he meant the Gentiles. (Vol. 1, 884–885.)

William J. McConnell, ex-governor of Idaho and ex-Senator of the United States from that State, when asked whether there was any public sentiment in Idaho in reference to prosecutions for simply unlawful cohabitation, as distinguished from new polygamous marriages, replied:

"It was understood and agreed when we adopted our State constitution and were admitted to statehood, that these old Mormons who had plural families would be allowed to support their wives and children without molestation. It was agreed by all parties, Democrats and Republicans alike, that they should be allowed to drift along. We could, under the law, have prosecuted these people and perhaps have sent them to jail. We could doubtless have broken up these families, but we felt it better that these men should be allowed to support these old women and these children than to further persecute them" (2; 522).

This witness was sharply cross-examined by Mr. Taylor and by the chairman on this subject, with the result that he made his testimony more emphatic (2, 524, 526).

On his redirect examination he further stated that he agreed to the foregoing testimony of Mr. Critchlow and Mr. Powers (2, 531, 532).

F. H. Holzheimer, a leading lawyer of Idaho, who was practicing his profession in Utah until November, 1902, testified that the issuing of the manifesto of 1890 brought about a very peculiar state of affairs, and that the question of how to take care of the problem was one which confronted the people of Utah, and which the witness did not think they have really solved.

He added:

"The consensus of opinion at that time was that those who had contracted marriages prior to the manifesto should be left alone. It was not, however, believed that they should openly violate the law and unlawfully cohabit with their numerous wives. I will say this, that where that has occurred it has been mostly in isolated cases. There have been a number of cases where children have been born, but in no case that I know of has it been done openly. It is true it is against the law, but it has not been done in such an open, lewd manner as has been intimated, nor has it been general. And because of the peculiar state of affairs it was the opinion that the whole thing would die out; that it was only a matter of a short time when the question would be entirely settled, because there would be no new marriages." (2; 575–576.)

Frank Martin, a lawyer of Idaho, testified that he believed those who were living in polygamous cohabitation in his State ought to be punished. But he added:

"A majority of our people seem to think that the best way, as far as concerns those old fellows who contracted these relations before the manifesto, as long as they stop it and do not take any new wives, or as long as no new wives are taken, is to let it go, to let it gradually die out, to let the old ones die." (2; 262.)

James H. Brady, a Gentile of Idaho, who operates several irrigation canals in that State and owns a power plant at the American Falls, when asked what is the sentiment in Idaho regarding disturbing or leaving undisturbed the men who went into polygamy prior to the manifesto of 1890, answered:

"To be absolutely frank in the matter, my judgment is that a majority of the men in Idaho would favor leaving those old men to live out their lives just as they have started in." (2; 649.)

J. W. N. Whitecotton, a lawyer who resides at Provo City, where Senator SMOOT lives, and who is intimately acquainted in most of the Mormon counties in Utah, was asked what has been the sentiment among non-Mormons in Utah in regard to the men who had entered into polygamy prior to the manifesto of 1890, and answered:

"Well, that is a pretty hard question to answer. The Gentiles in Utah have recognized that we have a very hard problem to deal with in that respect. It offers many embarrassing things. There has been a good deal said in this testimony—I have read it—about an understanding. I know nothing of any understanding in regard to that. But I do know this, that the people generally feel like they do not want to stir up this thing and set it to smelling any more. It has not a good odor.

"And there is another thing that they have taken into account in the neighborhood where I am, at least. When we get out to punish this man who is living in polygamy, put him in prison, they take into account somewhat the consequences that will come to his family. Now, the women who went into polygamy in Utah went into it because, although I think under a delusion, they thought it was a religious duty, and they are bound by the obligation. They feel that way.

"And under the rules of the church, as I understand them, a plural wife, if she is divorced from her husband, may not become the wife of another man, and those plural wives who have children are in a very precarious condition if they are to be entirely separated from the only protector they have. I think that the condition of these women and the children they have has probably entered as largely into the feeling of 'let the matter slide along and not bother it' as any other factor."

On his further examination on this subject, the following occurred:

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the sentiment in regard to those who contracted plural marriages before 1890 and are now living with their wives and having new children by them up to this time?

"Mr. WHITECOTTON. The sentiment is that it is an awful condition.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is a lawful condition?

"Mr. WHITECOTTON. That is an awful condition.

"The CHAIRMAN. Oh!

"Mr. WHITECOTTON. Leave off the 'l.' And we wish we were out of it. We do not know how to get out of it.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the sentiment with respect to that class of people—approval or disapproval?

"Mr. WHITECOTTON. They have the disapproval of the people generally, but that does not go to the extent of causing a man to shoulder the responsibility of setting the law in motion against that man.

"The CHAIRMAN. So that that class of men are left without interference?

"Mr. WHITECOTTON. They are left practically without interference. They have our regrets, but we do not know how to get at them.

"Senator FORAKER. You have said that that is largely because of the regard the people have for the condition in which the plural wives and children would be left in case of a successful prosecution?

"Mr. WHITECOTTON. Yes, sir. I think that (regard for plural wives and children) is the chief cause of withholding the hand of prosecution. Those women are human, and so are their children, and they are not much to blame, either, especially the children." (2; 679–680.)

Hiram E. Booth, a practicing lawyer of Salt Lake City, and one of the leading managers in the State of the Republican party, upon being asked to explain why it is that, if the people of Utah, including a large part of the Mormon people, are so opposed to polygamy, those who are living in polygamous relations are not interefered with, said:

"Well, my explanation of that is that the principal fight of the Gentiles has been to do away with polygamous marriages. While during many years there were numerous prosecutions for unlawful cohabitation, it was not for the purpose of punishment so much, those people who lived in unlawful cohabitation, as it was to bring about a cessation of polygamous marriages. That was the principle for which we strove, to stop people from marrying in polygamy. This was finally brought about in 1890 by the manifesto of the president of the church, which was affirmed, or sustained, as they call it, by the conference on October 6, 1890, and again in 1891. We did not accept that in good faith at that time.

"That is, we were somewhat skeptical about it; but later we did. Now, there has been since that time a disinclination to prosecute men and women who live in unlawful cohabitation. One of my own reasons—the way I look at it—was this: My sympathy was with the plural wife and her children. By these prosecutions she suffered more really than the husband did. In nearly all of the cases I may say the plural wife is a pure-minded woman, a woman who believed that it was right according to the law of God for her to accept that relation, and that she can not be released from her obligations when they are once entered upon.

"Mr. BOOTH. I should say, with Judge Powers and Mr. Critchlow, that the general sentiment among the Gentile people in Utah is a disinclination to prosecute those cases.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. If I understand you, when Senator SMOOT was a candidate for Senator, and when he became an apostle, which was in April, 1900, things had settled down in Utah by the general acquiescence of the people that if there would be no new polygamous marriages the people who had entered into that relation before the manifesto should not be disturbed?

"Mr. BOOTH. Should not be disturbed; no, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. And that was the state of opinion there when he became an apostle?

"Mr. BOOTH. That was the state of opinion when he became an apostle.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. And if he had gone against that state of opinion he would have been going against the public sentiment of the State, would he not?

"Mr. BOOTH. Yes.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Gentiles and Mormons?

"Mr. BOOTH. Gentiles and Mormons. I would say in that respect that where polygamous relations were carried on in such a way as to outrage public sentiment, in those cases, of course, a prosecution would have been demanded." (2; 714, 715, 723.)

Authur Pratt, who was deputy United States marshal in Utah from 1874 until 1882, and again from 1886 to 1890, and who probably arrested more Mormons charged with polygamy or polygamous cohabitation than any other man, said that he had heard Mr. Whitecotton and Mr. Booth testify on this subject, and that he agreed with them, for the reasons stated by them—not out of any pity or sympathy for the men, but out of sympathy and out of the suffering that would be entailed on the women and the children (2; 744).

E. D. R. Thompson, a non-Mormon, who has lived in Salt Lake City since 1889, never been a Mormon, and who has taken a leading part in Republican politics in that State, testified:

"Well, the general idea has been that this condition of things would gradually die away by the lapse of time. It has been generally repugnant to most people who take any position as against the Mormons in this matter which would imply either prosecution or persecution. In other words, they did not care to be informers." (2; 991.)

Charles De Moisy, a non-Mormon, who is a commissioner of the State bureau of statistics of Utah, and has never been a Mormon, says, in regard to the sentiment among Gentiles in Utah as to the punishment of those who live in polygamous cohabitation where the marriages were celebrated before the manifesto, "I think there is a matter of indifference about it"—that he himself thinks—"the less said about those things the better." (2; 1003.)

Glen Miller, a non-Mormon, who was United States marshal in the Territory of Utah for four and a half years, and had been a member of the State senate for two years after Utah had been admitted into the Union, when asked what is the sentiment of Gentiles in Utah in regard to prosecutions for polygamous cohabitation between persons who were married before the manifesto, answered:

"Well, there has been a sentiment against that, as there has been against any informing against any of the infractions of law generally. They have felt that it was only a question of time that the practice would die out through the death of those who practiced it and the removal of that generation" (3; 160).

John W. Hughes, who has never been a Mormon, and is the editor of a weekly paper in Salt Lake City, when asked the same question, replied:

"Well, the sentiment has been right along that these old fellows that are in polygamy—to let them alone and they will soon die out. Very soon none of them will be left. The great point with the Gentiles is that there will be no new plural marriages" (3; 163).

Mrs. Mary G. Coulter, a non-Mormon, whose husband is a physician in Ogden, testified:

"Those of us who have witnessed the old-time antagonisms and who are living and working for the new growth and progress do not believe in inquisitorial methods. We believe that the work of education, the establishment of industries, the developing of the mining regions, the building of railroads especially, and the influx of people, owing to the colonization schemes which are succeeding there, will in time eradicate all of the old and objectionable conditions." (3; 170.)

POLYGAMY IN OTHER COUNTRIES—HOW DEALT WITH.

A situation analogous to that existing in Utah after polygamy had been forbidden by the law of the church, as well as by the law of the State, arises in countries where polygamy is lawful, when missionaries have converted polygamists to the Christian faith. The question then frequently arises whether polygamists shall be admitted to the church; and if so, whether they shall be required to put away all of their families except one. In the argument of the case counsel for the respondent has referred to certain publications by various Christian churches, showing the proceedings that have taken place in some such cases and the results. The Presbyterian and Reformed Review, volume 7, for 1896, contains an article on "The baptism of polygamists in non-Christian lands," from which the following extracts are taken:

"At the regular meeting of the synod of India, held in Ludhiana, November, 1894, among the most important questions which came before the synod was this: Whether in the case of a Mohammedan or Hindoo with more than one wife, applying for baptism, he should in all cases, as a condition of baptism, be required to put away all his wives but one. After a very thorough discussion, lasting between two or three sessions of the synod, it was resolved, by a vote of 36 to 10, to request the general assembly, 'in view of the exceedingly difficult complications which often occur in the cases of polygamists who desire to be received into the church, to leave the ultimate dicision of all such cases in India to the synod of India.' The memorialists add: 'It is the almost unanimous opinion of the members of the synod that, under some circumstances, converts who have more than one wife, together with their entire families, should be baptized.'

"Not only is it thus the fact that more than four-fifths of the members of the synod of India believe that it may sometimes be our duty, under the conditions of society in India, to baptize a polygamist without requiring him first to put away all his wives but one, but when the missionary ladies present during the sessions of the synod, desirous of ascertaining the state of opinion among themselves on this subject, took a vote thereupon, of these thirty-six ladies, many of them intimately familiar with the interior of zenana life for years, all feeling no less hatred of polygamous marriage than their sisters in America, all but three signified their agreement with the majority of the synod, of which minority of three two had been only a few days in India, and were therefore without any experience touching the practical questions involved. Nor is this large majority of our missionaries singular in their belief on this subject.

"When some years ago the question was debated in the Panjab missionary conference, in which a large number of the missionaries and eminent Christian laymen of all denominations took part, ten out of twelve of the speakers expressed the same opinion as that held by more than four-fifths of the synod of India to-day. So the Rev. Dr. James J. Lucas, of Saharanpur, says that the brethren who maintained the lawfulness of not requiring a polygamist to put away any of his wives as a prerequisite to baptism 'are not even in a minority in the missionary body in India.'

"A few years ago the Madura Mission voted in favor of baptizing such, provided they had contracted their marriages in ignorance and there was no equitable way of securing a separation. Their action was disapproved by the American board, but it none the less illustrates again what is the judgment of a large part of those who, living in India, are in most intimate relation to the living facts, and who are thus far better qualified to form a right decision than can be the wisest men at home."

"Again, as bearing on the polygamist's duty, it should be noted that in the great majority of cases among the Hindus the second marriage is contracted because of the first wife having no children. So that when the general assembly requires the polygamist convert to put away all wives but the first, it requires him not only to signalize his conversion by violating a contract held valid alike by his Christian rulers and a large part of his Christian brethren, but to do this in such a way as shall inflict the greatest amount possible of cruel injustice and suffering, by turning out of his house that wife who is the mother of his children (who will naturally in most cases have to go with her) and denying to her conjugal rights of protection and cohabitation which he had pledged her.

"The wrong involved is aggravated under the conditions of life in India, in that it will commonly be practically impossible for the wife turned off, whichever she be, to escape the suspicion of being an unchaste woman, and she will inevitably be placed in a position where, with good name beclouded and no lawful protector, she will be under the strongest temptation to live an immoral life. No doubt polygamy is wrong; but then, is not breach of faith and such injustice and cruelty to an innocent woman and her children also wrong? If there is a law against polygamy, is there not a law also against these things even more explicit and indubitable? In the case supposed both can not be kept. Which shall the man be instructed to break?

"The general assembly of 1875 appears to have imagined that the injustice was done away by enjoining a man to 'make suitable provision for her support that is put away, and for her children, if she have any.' But this utterly fails to meet the case. For the breach of faith required remains, since the marriage contract, both according to Scripture and the law of all Christian lands, as well as of India, binds the husband not only to support, but equally to profection and cohabitation. But by the deliverence of 1875 all missionaries in non-Christian lands are directed by the general assembly to instruct the convert that, in order to baptism, he must keep the compact as regards the first particular, but break it as regards the others.

"Moreover, the moral end sought will, even so, not be gained. The wife put away may live in a separate house and at a distance—but then polygamists sometimes keep different wives in different homes—and it will not be easy to persuade a Hindoo or Mohammedan community, especially if the man still continue to give her money, as required by the assembly's law, that cohabitation really ceases."

In India and Christian Opportunity, a book published in 1904, the author of which is Harlan P. Beach, M. A., F. R. G. S., in dealing with the general subject of "Problems connected with new converts," the author, at page 222, says:

"1. Polygamy.—One difficulty in the way of receiving a professed convert, though affecting only a small percentage of candidates, is a most perplexing one; it is that of applicants who have more than one wife. As Hindoo or Mohammedan they have entered in good faith into marriage contracts with these wives, and if a man puts away all but one, what provision shall be made for the rejected, and on what principle shall he decide as to the one to be retained?

"While it is a question easily answered in missionary-society councils at home, it is a more serious problem at the front. Some good missionaries hold that where the husband is living the Christian life in all sincerity it is better to receive into the church such a candidate—though not eligible to any church office—than to require him to give up all but one wife and thus brand with illegitimacy his children by them, as well as occasion the wives so put away endless reproach and embarrassments."

In India's Problem, Krishna or Christ, which was published in 1903, the author of which is John P. Jones, D. D., of southern India, A. B. C. F. M., the author, in dealing with this question, says, on pages 289 and 290:

"In the consideration of the problem many things must be kept in mind. None more important than the claims to a cordial welcome from the church of any man who, in true faith and Christian earnestness, seeks admittance. If it be demanded of the man that he put away all but one of those wives taken in heathenism, then we ask whether it is Christian, or even just, to cast away one to whom he was solemnly and religiously pledged according to the laws of the land and with whom he has been linked in love and harmony for years and from whom he has gotten children? And if he is to put away one or more of his wives, which one shall it be? Shall it be the first wife?

"Certainly that would not be Christian. Or shall it be the second wife, who is the mother of his children and whom he probably married at the request of the first, who was childless, in order that he might raise seed unto himself? It is not easy on Christian grounds to decide such a problem as this, nor is it very Christian to put a ban upon any woman who, in accordance with their religion and their country's laws, has formed this sacred alliance with a man and has lived with him for years. Nor can it be right to brand with illegitimacy the children born of such a wedlock.

"I would not allow such persons, received into the Christian church, to become officers of the church. But I can not see why there may not be an humble place in the church of God for such and their families."

Whatever may be our personal views as to the propriety of the conduct of the people of Utah in thus practically overlooking the continuance of polygamous relations where those relations arose out of marriages celebrated before the manifesto of 1890, there can be no doubt that when REED SMOOT, in April, 1900, became an apostle of the Mormon Church, the great majority of the people of the State, non-

Mormons as well as Mormons, had practically agreed that it would be unwise to prosecute those who are living in such relations, or to in any wise interfere with them, unless those relations were flagrantly obtruded upon public notice.

REED SMOOT NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR POLYGAMY.

The charge of the protestants in this case, in substance, is that REED SMOOT connived at and encouraged, thereby becoming responsible for, the polygamous relations of certain of the officials of the church and of other polygamists. There is no evidence to support this charge except the fact that he acquiesced without protest in what the people of Utah generally accepted as unavoidable. In his answer and in his testimony, on his oath, he has positively denied that he has ever advised any person to violate the law, either against polygamy or against polygamous cohabitation.

No witness has been produced who has testified that he ever heard the respondent give any such advice, or in any wise defend such acts. The most anybody has attempted to charge is that he has, like others, both Mormons and non-Mormons, ignored the offense of polygamous cohabitation, both in the church and under the laws of the State, when such polygamous cohabitation was in consequence of plural marriages solemnized before 1890.

In view of the general situation and the fact that non-Mormons, even the most active opponents of the church, had by common consent adopted the policy of acquiescence as the wisest plan to pursue as to polygamous cohabitation, relying on time and the course of nature to cure the trouble, we do not think such passive acquiescence on the part of Mr. SMOOT can be held to amount to such an indorsement and encouragement of polygamous cohabitation as to make him responsible for it.

POLYGAMOUS MARRIAGES SINCE 1890.

It is further charged that notwithstanding the acts of Congress forbidding them, and in defiance of the manifesto of 1890, polygamous marriages have been celebrated by the authorities of the church since 1890.

We have already shown that since the manifesto forbidding the celebration of plural marriages became the law of the church by being ratified at a semiannual conference of the church, neither the president of the church nor any other officer thereof has the power to celebrate a plural marriage which would be any more binding under the law of the church than it would be under the law of the land.

Evidence relating to such plural marriages since 1890 could, of course, be competent in this case only as it might, with other evidence, tend to show that the respondent has advised such marriages, or in some way connived at or approved them.

On this point there is some evidence tending to show, but not in fact showing, that in the period of over fifteen years which has elapsed since the manifesto of 1890 was promulgated there may have been some fifteen or twenty cases in which a member of the Mormon Church has cohabited with a woman as his plural wife with whom he sustained no such relation prior to 1890.

In only one instance has the evidence shown the actual performance of the marriage ceremony and that occurred in Mexico. In that case it appears that a woman named Kennedy, in the year 1896, with her mother, on several occasions appealed to Apostle Teasdale, in Mexico, to marry her to a man who was already married and had a wife living, and that the apostle, whenever appealed to, refused to perform the marriage ceremony on the ground that it was forbidden by the church.

The parties then traveled in a wagon about 75 miles to an out-of-the-way place where, according to the testimony of the woman, Brigham Young, jr., another apostle, did marry her to the man in question. At the time this testimony was given Brigham Young, jr., was dead. No person testified to the ceremony except the woman who was married, and she stated that she did not tell Brigham Young that the man whom she was marrying had a wife living, and that so far as she knew he was not informed of that fact by any person.

There was no evidence offered tending to prove that the respondent had any knowledge of this alleged plural marriage until it came out in the testimony before the committee.

Among the cases of alleged plural marriage since 1890, referred to in the evidence, are those of two of the apostles, John W. Tayler and Mathias F. Cowley.

As to Apostle Tayler, L. E. Abbott gave testimony tending to show that it became public talk in or about 1902 that Tayler had then recently taken two plural wives. As to Apostle Cowley, the testimony is exceedingly indefinite as to whether he took a plural wife at all since 1890, and if so, when.

The respondent was examined as a witness in his own behalf, after the testimony with reference to the alleged recent plural marriages of these two apostles had been introduced, and on this subject testified that he knew nothing about the alleged marriages until the testimony relating to them was introduced here before the committee. He further said that he would ask that an investigation be made by the church authorities, and if it turned out that the charges were true he would not again vote to sustain them as apostles.

The taking of testimony in this case was closed and the case submitted to the committee after argument by counsel in February, 1905. But at the beginning of the present session, it being made known to the committee that it was desired to introduce further evidence on behalf of the protestants, the case was reopened and further testimony was heard on behalf of both the protestants and the respondent. The testimony was closed the second time on March 27, 1906; but, consulting the convenience of counsel for the protestants, the hearing by the committee of the final arguments of counsel in this case was postponed until April 12, 1906.

On account of these delays, for which neither the respondent nor his counsel are in any wise responsible, the case was not finally submitted to the committee for determination until after the final conference of the Mormon Church, which was held at Salt Lake City on April 6, 1906. At that conference it was made known that Taylor and Cowley had resigned from their positions as apostles in the preceding October, and that the resignations had been accepted. The conference approved this action, and also filled the vacancies thus created by new appointments.

We deem it unnecessary to go at length into the evidence relating to the other allegel plural marriages since 1890, for the reason that there is no evidence whatever in the record which even tends to show, as to any such plural marriage, actual or alleged, that the respondent had any knowledge that it was intended such marriage should be celebrated, or that he ever countenanced it in any way, or that since it took place he has at any time or in any way expressed approval of it.

In 1890, when the manifesto was promulgated, there were in the Mormon Church, according to church statistics, in the United States some 2,451 polygamous families. In May, 1902, this number had been reduced to 897. How many are left and how many of them are in Utah it is impossible to say; but probably about 500 would be a fair estimate. Many of the heads of these families are of advanced age. The population of Utah at the present time is about 500,000.

These figures strongly tend to show that, as a matter of fact, new polygamous marriages in Utah in any considerable numbers can not have taken place since 1890. In further evidence of this fact, and as showing the state of public sentiment as to polygamous cohabitation, we insert here an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 5, 1903, page 1729 et seq., showing a statement made by Senator DUBOIS, who is well known to have familiar knowledge of this subject:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 5, 1903, p. 1729, et seq.]

"Mr. DUBOIS. * * * Various causes operated to cause the Mormons to abandon polygamy. There was a feeling among the younger members of the Mormon Church, and a very strong feeling, that polygamy should be done away with. So here was this pressure within the church against polygamy and the pressure by the Government from outside the church against polygamy.

"In 1891, I think it was, the president of the Mormon Church issued a manifesto declaring that thereafter there should be no polygamous marriages anywhere in the Mormon Church. The Mormons were then called together in one of their great conferences, where they meet by the thousands. This manifesto was issued to them by the first presidency, which is their authority, was submitted to them, and all the Mormon people ratified and agreed to this manifesto, doing away with polygamy thereafter.

"The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will recall that I came here as a Senator from Idaho shortly after that, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] will recall how bitter and almost intemperate I was in my language before his committee and on the floor of the other House in the denunciation of these practices of the Mormon Church. But after that manifesto was issued, in common with all of the Gentiles of that section who had made this fight, we said:

"'They have admitted the right of our contention and say now, like children who have been unruly, we will obey our parents and those who have a right to guide us; we will do those things no more.' Therefore we could not maintain our position and continue punishing them unless it was afterwards demonstrated that they would not comply with their promise.

"After a few years in Idaho, where the fight was the hottest and the thickest, we wiped all of those laws from our statute books which aimed directly at the Mormon people; and to-day the laws on the statute books of Idaho against polygamy and kindred crimes are less stringent than in almost any other State in the Union. I live among those people; and, so far as I know, in Idaho there has not been a polygamous marriage celebrated since that manifesto was issued, and I have yet to find a man in Idaho or anywhere else who will say that a polygamous marriage has been celebrated anywhere since the issuance of that manifesto.

"Mr. HALE. Then, it must follow from that, as the years go by and as the older people disappear, polygamy as a practice will be practically removed.

"Mr. DUBOIS. There is no question about it; and I will say to the Senator, owing to the active part which we took in that fierce contest in Idaho, I with others who had made that fight thought we were justified in making this promise to the Mormon people. We had no authority of law, but we took it upon ourselves to assure them that those older men who were living in the polygamous relation, who had growing families which they had reared and were rearing before the manifesto was issued, and at a time when they thought they had a right under the Constitution to enter into polygamous relation—that those older men and women and their children should not be disturbed; that the polygamous man should be allowed to support his numerous wives and their children.

"The polygamous relations, of course, should not continue, but we would not compel a man to turn his families adrift. We promised that the older ones who had contracted those relations before the manifesto was issued would not be persecuted by the Gentile; that time would be given for them to pass away, but that the law would be strenuously enforced against any polygamous marriage which might be contracted in the future."

As further evidence of the same character we call attention to the testimony of Judge Charles W. Morse, a member of the Methodist Church and one of the judges of the third judicial district of Utah. In May, 1903, by his direction, a special grand jury was convened at Salt Lake City for the purpose of investigating charges that new polygamous marriages were being celebrated. This grand jury was composed of Mormons and non-Mormons. Its report will be found on pages 867 to 870 of volume 3 of the testimony. In their report they say:

"We have investigated thoroughly all such cases brought to our attention by the district attorney and by citizens who have appeared before us, which were reported to have occurred within the jurisdiction of this court, and have not been able to secure evidence that a single case of polygamy has occurred in this district since Utah became a State. The rumors of the commission of this crime seem to have grown out of innocent circumstances, which in ordinary communities would have created no suspicion or scandal, but which here, probably owing to a feature of our territorial history, have been seized upon and the crime assumed without evidence, much to the chagrin and injury of innocent citizens, and greatly to the detriment of our State and its reputation throughout the nation. Those who prize the fair name of our State and the rights of our neighbors should hereafter be more careful to secure facts and evidence before charging this crime."

Judge McCarty, whose testimony has already been referred to, testified as follows:

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am coming down to that question next. What is your observation there as to whether, as a matter of fact, the number of people living in polygamy has decreased since 1890 in Utah?

"Mr. MCCARTY. Oh, the change has been phenomenal.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Phenomenal?

"Mr. MCCARTY. Yes; phenomenal. There are only a very few. In the little town in which I resided there for over twenty years there were a large number of polygamists. Oh, there must have been in the neighborhood of twenty of them, and I can not call to mind now but three of those old men who are living. They have all died or moved away. Two of them procured divorces, either a church divorce for a plural wife or a divorce in the courts for the legal wife.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. What town is that to which you refer?

"Mr. MCCARTY. That is Monroe.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. So that there polygamy is practically extinct?

"Mr. MCCARTY. Yes; and what can be said of Monroe can be said of most other towns in the State.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Most other towns in the State?

"Mr. MCCARTY. Yes." (Vol. 3, 888, 889.)

THE MORMON CHURCH AND POLITICS.

As to the charge that the Mormon Church interferes in and controls political affairs in Utah, we find the facts established by the evidence to be substantially as follows: From the time the Mormons reached Utah, in the summer of 1847, until 1891 there were no political parties in that Territory in the sense in which that expression would be used in other parts of the United States. There grew up in the Territory of Utah during that time two parties, one known as the People's Party, which was comprised exclusively of members of the Mormon Church and was controlled by the leaders of that church, and the Liberal party, which was composed of non-Mormons.

Owing to controversies concerning polygamy and other matters not in issue elsewhere in the United States, these two parties were not only composed, on the one hand, of members of a religious sect and on the other hand of those opposing that sect, but the controversy between the two parties was extremely bitter. It seems not to be controverted that until the year 1891 the People's Party was not only dominated by the church, but practically was the church. But after the manifesto of 1890, hereinbefore referred to, which forbade further polygamous marriages, many members, both of the Liberal party and of the People's Party, conceived it to be to the interests of the Territory that the people should divide on party lines as they were divided in other parts of the country, and that the Liberal party and the People's Party should be disbanded.

In the course of a few months this purpose was carried into effect. The great majority of the voters of the Territory of Utah, Mormons and non-Mormons, became either Republicans or Democrats, and political controversies in the Territory till 1896 and after that time in the State have been waged, as a rule, on the lines of the national political parties.

While it is no doubt true that the habit which the church and the members of the church had followed for so many years prior to the breaking up of the old parties of voters receiving counsel from officials of the church in regard to the selection of candidates for office was not at once completely broken off, yet the evidence further establishes that the improvement in this regard has been very rapid and that, of late years, the Mormon voters of the State adhere more closely to party lines than the non-Mormons do. We think the evidence establishes the fact that since REED SMOOT became an apostle of the Mormon Church on the 6th day of April, 1900, the Mormon Church has not controlled or attempted to control elections in Utah.

It is claimed, however, that the church, by an instrument called the "Political rule," has required of its members holding office in the church that before they shall become candidates for any political position they shall receive the consent of the church authorities; and that by this device the church has controlled the election of Senators of the United States.

This political rule will be found on pages 168 to 171, Volume I, of the printed report of the testimony before the committee. The meaning and effect of this instrument were very fully considered in the case of Moses Thatcher, who in 1896 was a candidate before the legislature of the State of Utah for election as Senator of the United States.

Thatcher, at the time, was one of the twelve apostles of the church, and he did not seek or obtain the consent of the church authorities to this candidacy. For this offense he was tried before a high church tribunal. The decision of this tribunal, the acceptance thereof by Moses Thatcher, and the acquiescense by the church authorities in the terms upon which he accepted the conclusion of the tribunal, will be found upon pages 563 to 573 of the same volume. Mr. Thatcher was a witness before the committee, and his testimony on this subject will be found on pages 1038 to 1040 of that volume.

The upshot of it all is that the political rule, as construed by these proceedings, left Thatcher, to use his own words, absolutely free as an American citizen, to exercise his rights as such, and left all the officers of the church absolutely free. In his acceptance of the decision of the council Thatcher expressly stipulated that in accepting it he violated none of the engagements theretofore entered into by him, "under the requirements of party pledges respecting the political independence of the citizen, who remains untrameled, as contemplated in the guaranties of the State constitution."

Indeed, in the political rule itself it is expressly stated that if any officer of the church wishes to become a candidate for a political office or to enter into any other engagement which will interfere with the duties of his church office, he may do so without soliciting or obtaining the consent of the church or its authorities by resigning his ecclesiastical position. The whole purport and effect of the rule seems to be that high church officials, filling positions which require them to give their time to their ecclesiastical duties, shall not enter into any engagements of any kind, political or otherwise, which require them to abandon or neglect such ecclesiastical duties, without first obtaining the consent of the authorities of the church.

Thus construed, the rule seems to be a reasonable one; but whether reasonable or unreasonable it does not seem to us that it is within the province of the General Government to interfere with it or punish in any way the members of the church because of its promulgation.

The evidence in the case clearly establishes that Mr. SMOOT, for some time before he became a candidate for the Senate and even before he became an apostle, was one of the leaders of the Republican party in the State of Utah; that he had been frequently spoken of either as a candidate for the governorship of the State or the Senate of the United States; that when he became a candidate for the Senate he was, in the words of some of the witnesses, the logical candidate for that office, and that he was elected by the votes of the Republicans in the legislature—Mormons and non-Mormons—and was opposed by the Democrats in that body—Mormons and non-Mormons. He says, in his testimony, that before formally becoming a candidate he went to the first president of the church and obtained the consent of the church to his becoming a candidate.

As already intimated, if that consent had been refused, it meant no more than if he became a Senator he must give up his apostleship.

There has been no evidence offered tending to show that any member of the Mormon Church has ever asked consent to become a candidate for any office and been refused.

THE ENDOWMENT OATH.

The only other charge made against the respondent which, in our opinion, merits attention was made in the protest signed by John L. Leilich, as follows:

"That the oath of office required of and taken by the said REED SMOOT as an apostle of the said church is of such a nature and character that he is thereby disqualified from taking the oath of office required of a United States Senator." (1; 28.)

This same charge was in effect made in the protest signed by W. M. Paden and 17 others in the following clause as a deduction from previous statements rather than a specific charge in itself:

"We submit that however formal and regular may be Apostle SMOOT'S credentials or his qualifications by way of citizenship, whatever his protestations of patriotism and loyalty, it is clear that the obligations of any official oath which he may subscribe are and of necessity must be as threads of tow compared with the covenants which bind his intellect, his will, and his affections, and which hold him forever in accord with and subject to the will of a defiant and lawbreaking apostolate." (1; 25.)

In the sworn answer made by the respondent to these charges on this subject he says:

"As to the charge that the respondent is bound by some oath or obligation controlling his duty and his oath as a Senator, the respondent says that he has never taken any such oath or in any way assumed any such obligations. He holds himself bound to obey and uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the condition in reference to polygamy upon which the State of Utah was admitted into the Union." (1; 31.)

During the examination of the first witness called by the protestants, Joseph F. Smith, a discussion arose, in which Senator HOAR stated that he understood that the committee had reached a conclusion that there were two issues in the case—one whether REED SMOOT had practiced polygamy, which the Senator understood had been abandoned, and that the only other one was whether or not as an official of the Mormon Church the respondent took an oath or obligation that was superior in his estimation and in its requirements upon him to the oath or obligation which he must take to qualify him as a Senator.

Thereupon Senator DUBOIS stated that both these contentions were set aside entirely and that it was not contended that they would be attempted to be proved by the attorneys representing the protestants. (1; 114.) In the course of further discussion a member of the committee having stated that he never knew until Mr. Tayler had stated it that he had abandoned the idea of proving that the respondent had taken an obligation that interfered with the obligations of his oath, Mr. Tayler replied:

"I can not abandon that which I never occupied or possessed."

Senator DUBOIS added, "He never alleged it." (1; 115.)

On a subsequent day, Senator BEVERIDGE, in order, as he stated, to correct what he thought was a mistake in the popular mind as to what were the charges against the respondent which the committee was considering, said that it had been charged that the respondent was a polygamist, which charge had been withdrawn, and that he had been charged with taking an oath inconsistent with his duty as a Senator, which Senator BEVERIDGE understood Mr. Tayler to say was not a charge that had been withdrawn, but was such a charge as had never been made, and that, therefore, the issue upon which the committee would proceed from that time on, so far as the protestants were concerned, was whether the respondent was a member of a conspiracy.

Thereupon Senator DUBOIS again stated that no charge had been made against Mr. SMOOT of taking an oath inconsistent with his oath as Senator except the Leilich charge, which had been abandoned and repudiated, and that the attorneys for the respondent "have been trying to force the protestants to issues which they themselves have never raised." (Vol. 1, p. 126.)

This was the state of the record when the testimony of Joseph F. Smith and several other witnesses had been taken, and the examination of Francis M. Lyman, one of the apostles, was progressing.

He was asked by the chairman to state what the "ceremony is in going through the endowment house." This being objected to by the counsel for respondent, the chairman said:

"One of the charges is that Mr. SMOOT has taken an oath or obligation incompatible with his obligation as a Senator. The object of this question is to ascertain from this witness, who went through the endowment house—of course I know nothing about it—whether any such obligation is taken."

Counsel for the respondent having thereupon stated that they understood that that charge had been expressly disclaimed by counsel for the protestants, the chairman replied:

"Counsel stated that they did not propose, as far as they were concerned, to offer any proof upon that question, but the Chair did not understand that therefore the committee was precluded from showing it." (1; 436.)

A little later in the same session Mr. Tayler, counsel for the protestants, again stated:

"It is in respect of those two things around which all of this case gathers—polygamy and the direction of the people by the apostolate—and if those two were eliminated this hearing would not be going on here." (1; 463.)

After the chairman of the committee had ruled, as above stated, that the witness Lyman was required to answer the question, his examination on this subject proceeded as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state what the ceremony is in going through the endowment house?

"Mr. LYMAN. I could not do so.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I object to that, Mr. Chairman, on the ground that it is inquiring into a matter prior to 1890, and I understood, or we were informed that the committee had decided that would not be done.

"The CHAIRMAN. One of the charges is that Mr. SMOOT has taken an oath or obligation incompatible with his obligation as a Senator. The object of this question is to ascertain from this witness, who went through the endowment house—of course I know nothing about it—whether any such obligation is taken.

"Mr. LYMAN. Is that the question you asked me, Mr. Chairman?

"The CHAIRMAN. No; that was not my question. It was a statement to counsel.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I had understood, Mr. Chairman, that that was expressly disclaimed by counsel here the other day.

"The CHAIRMAN. Counsel stated that they did not propose, as far as they were concerned, to offer any proof upon that question; but the chairman did not understand that therefore the committee was precluded from showing it. Is there any objection to the question?

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I do object to it for the reasons already stated; and, further, because it does not follow at all that because the witness went through certain ceremonies or took certain obligations, if you please, Senator SMOOT took them.

"The CHAIRMAN. That would not follow of itself. If nothing further than this can be shown, of course it will have no bearing upon Mr. SMOOT at all. Read the question, Mr. Reporter.

"The reporter read as follows:

"'The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state what the ceremony is in going through the endowment house?

"'Mr. LYMAN. I could not do so.'

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I do insist upon my objection. I understood the Chair to ask me whether I had any further objection.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is permissible; and, as the Chair stated, if nothing appears beyond this to connect Mr. SMOOT with it, of course it will have no bearing upon the case. Can you state what that ceremony was?

"Mr. LYMAN. I could not, Mr. Chairman; I could not do so if it was to save my life.

"The CHAIRMAN. You could not?

"Mr. LYMAN. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Can you state any portion of it?

"Mr. LYMAN. I might approximate something of it that I remember.

"The CHAIRMAN. As nearly as you can.

"Mr. LYMAN. I remember that I agreed to be an upright and moral man, pure in my life. I agreed to refrain from sexual commerce with any woman except my wife or wives, as were given to me in the priesthood. The law of purity I subscribed to willingly, of my own choice, and to be true and good to all men. I took no oath nor obligation against any person or any country or government or kingdom or anything of that kind. I remember that distinctly.

"The CHAIRMAN. Of course the charge is made, and I want to know the facts. You would know about it, having gone through the endowment house?

"Mr. LYMAN. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. There was nothing of that kind?

"Mr. LYMAN. Nothing of that kind.

"The CHAIRMAN. No obligation or oath?

"Mr. LYMAN. Not at all; no, sir." (1; 436, 437.)

After this had occurred, Joseph F. Smith was recalled, and on this subject was further examined by counsel for the respondent, as follows:

"Mr. TAYLER. I wish to ask two questions. Mr. Smith, something has been said about an endowment oath. I do not want to go into that subject or to inquire of you what it is, but whatever oath or obligation has been taken by those who have been admitted to the church, at whatever stage it is taken, is the same now that it has been for years?

"Mr. SMITH. It is the same that it has always been.

"Mr. TAYLER. It is the same that it has always been?

"Mr. SMITH. Yes; so far as I know.

"Mr. TAYLER. No other oath is taken now than heretofore?

"Mr. SMITH. I should like to say that there is no oath taken; that we abjure oaths. We do not take oaths unless we are forced to take them.

"Mr. TAYLER. I understand. You understand what I mean—any obligation——

"Mr. SMITH. Covenant or agreement—we do that.

"Mr. TAYLER. Any obligation of loyalty to the church such as would be proper to be taken?

"Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

"Mr. TAYLER. That is the same now that it has always been?

"Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; that it has always been, so far as I know. I can only say that they are the same as they were revealed to me.

"Mr. TAYLER. Exactly.

"Mr. SMITH. And as they were taught to me.

"Mr. TAYLER. You have known them for forty years or more?

"Mr. SMITH. I have been more or less acquainted with them for a great many years." (1; 484.)

It will be seen that neither the witness Lyman nor the witness Joseph F. Smith declined to answer any question that was put to him with regard to this alleged covenant or obligation.

The next witness on the subject (who, like the two preceding witnesses, was summoned and examined on behalf of the protestants), was Brigham H. Roberts. After counsel for the protestants had examined this witness and announced that they had no further questions to ask him, the following occurred:

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Roberts, there is another subject upon which I want to ask you a question. It has been stated here that the endowment house was taken down in 1890.

"Mr. ROBERTS. I think earlier than that.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, at some time it was taken down?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever go through the endowment house?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. When?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I think it was in 1877.

"The CHAIRMAN. Have you been present at times when others have passed through the endowment house?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Frequently?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Is the ceremony that used to be performed in what was called "the endowment house" performed now?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I think so.

"The CHAIRMAN. Where?

"Mr. ROBERTS. When?

"The CHAIRMAN. Where, I say?

"Mr. ROBERTS. In the temples, as I understand it.

"The CHAIRMAN. How many temples are there in Utah?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I believe there are four.

"The CHAIRMAN. And the ceremony that used to be performed in the endowment house is now performed in the temple?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. He says he thinks it is. He does not know.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the ceremony?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir; I do not remember the ceremonies distinctly.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember any portion of it?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Only in a general way, Senator.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you know, Mr. Roberts, of any change in the ceremony performed in the endowment house and as it is performed to-day in the temple?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. The ceremony is the same. Now, will you state to the committee what that ceremony was, or is, as nearly as you can?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Well, the ceremonies consist of what would be considered a series of ceremonies, I take it, of which I only have a general impression.

"The CHAIRMAN. You have something more than a general impression in your own case?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No; I think not.

"The CHAIRMAN. How many days did it take you to go through the endowment house?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Well, part of one day.

"The CHAIRMAN. Who were present at the time? Do you remember?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I do not remember.

"The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell the committee any portion of that ceremony?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Why not?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Well, for one reason, I do not feel at liberty to do so.

"The CHAIRMAN. Why not?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Because I consider myself in trust in relation to those matters, and I do not feel at liberty to make any disclosures in relation to them.

"The CHAIRMAN. It was then a secret?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Does this religious denomination have, as one of its ceremonies, secret obligations or covenants?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I think they could not be properly called secrets. Of course they are common to all worthy members of the church, and generally known by them.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, secret from the world?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Secret from the world.

"The CHAIRMAN. The obligations and covenants, whatever they are, then you are not at liberty to disclose?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir; I would be led to regard those obligations as similar to those who perhaps have passed through Masonic fraternities, or are members of Masonic fraternities.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then your church organization in that particular is a sort of Masonic fraternity?

"Mr. ROBERTS. It is analogous, perhaps, in some of its features.

"The CHAIRMAN. You say you can remember, of course, what occurred, but you do not feel at liberty to disclose it, and for that reason you will not disclose it?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Not specifically. I do not wish, however, Senator, to be understood as being in any sense defiant in that matter.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is not so understood, Mr. Roberts, at all.

"Mr. ROBERTS. I do not wish to put myself in opposition or raise any issue here at all.

"The CHAIRMAN. The reason you have assigned is accepted. The obligation, whatever it is, taken in the endowment house, is such that you do not feel at liberty to disclose it?

"Mr. ROBERTS. That is right.

"The CHAIRMAN. Should you do so, what would you expect as the result?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I would expect to lose caste with my people as betraying a trust.

"Senator OVERMAN. Do all members of the church have to go through that?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Not all members.

"Senator OVERMAN. What proportion of them, and how is it regulated?

"Mr. ROBERTS. It is governed chiefly by worthiness—moral worthiness.

"Senator BAILEY. And is it somewhat a matter of degrees, as it is in Masonry? I believe they have several degrees.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall whether any penalty was imposed upon a person who should disclose the covenants?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. You do not remember?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Beyond the disfavor and distrust of his fellows.

"The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever been present at a marriage ceremony in the temple?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Could you tell what that is?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I could not, only in a general way. The ceremony is of some length. I remember performing the ceremony in the case of my own daughter when she was married, and, not being familiar with the ceremony, a copy of it was placed in my hands and I read the ceremony, but I could only remember the general terms of it.

"The CHAIRMAN. If the members who have gone through the endowment house, then, keep faith with the church they will not disclose what occurred?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"Senator BAILEY. Do you feel at liberty, Mr. Roberts, to say whether or not there is anything in that ceremony that permits a man—I will adopt a different expression—that abridges a man's freedom of political action or action in any respect, except in a religious way?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"Sentor BAILEY. I do not quite understand whether you mean by your answer to say that you do not feel free to answer that or that there is nothing.

"Mr. ROBERTS. I mean to say that there is nothing. (1; 740, 742.) * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask Mr. Roberts one further question. What is there in these obligations—I will not use the term "oaths"—that makes it necessary to keep them from the world?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know of anything especially, except it be their general sacredness.

"The CHAIRMAN. Their general sacredness? Ought sacred things to be kept from the world?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I think some sacred things ought to be.

"The CHAIRMAN. Could you name one sacred thing in connection with this ceremony that should be kept from the world?

"Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Why? Because you can not remember?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Well, I could not say that. I would not say that, Senator.

"The CHAIRMAN. You do remember it, then—the sacred thing that you mean?

"Mr. ROBERTS. Some sacred things I do.

"The CHAIRMAN. But you can not state to the committee what they are?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I ask to be excused from stating them.

"The CHAIRMAN. But I can not understand exactly how the church organization has things that the world must not know of. I did not know but you could give some reason why.

"Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think I could throw any light upon that subject.

"The CHAIRMAN. All right; I will not press it." (1; 743.)

* * * * * * *

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I would like to ask, Mr. Roberts, whether this obligation or ceremony to which you refer in the endowment house relates entirely to things spiritual or whether it relates to things temporal also?

"The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be better, Mr. Worthington, to let him state what the obligation is?

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes; so far as I am concerned, I would very much prefer it; but I understand the suggestion by Senator PETTUS was that he was interpreting that which he would state.

"Of course I do not know anything more about this than the members of the committee do, but I think it might very well be that a witness might be allowed to state, and might properly say, that he would answer here as to anything that related to any temporal affairs; but as to things which related to matters between him and his God, or which he conceived to be between him and his God, he would not answer here or anywhere else, and that would not be an interpretation, but would simply be taking the protection which I understand the law gives to every man—that as to things which do relate entirely to religious matters they are matters which he has a right to keep within his own breast.

"The CHAIRMAN. Your question was whether these obligations related to spiritual affairs or temporal affairs.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes; that was my question.

"The CHAIRMAN. The trouble is he interprets a thing which is unknown and unseeable to us, and which he considers spiritual.

"Mr. CARLISLE. What he considers spiritual we might consider temporal, if the matter itself was disclosed.

"The CHAIRMAN. It seems to me that the witness having refused to state what the ceremony is, or what the obligations demand, ought not to be questioned and permitted to state what he thinks it did not convey, or what obligation it imposed, or what it did not impose. The committee can judge of that.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Of course we are here not representing the witness, but representing only Senator SMOOT.

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. And it is the witness pleading a privilege and making the refusal and not Senator SMOOT or his counsel. We would like to have this question answered.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the question?

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. The question is whether this obligation refers to things spiritual or things temporal.

"Senator BAILEY. I do not think it makes any difference to the committee in the end, or will affect its conclusions, whether that is answered or not. I am partly responsible for that line of questions, and I asked the first question myself because I really intended to insist, if it related in any way to the duties of a citizen, that the committee was entitled to know what that was, and if it did not, then I had no further interest in it.

"The CHAIRMAN. Let the witness answer that question.

"Mr. ROBERTS. May I have the question read?

"The CHAIRMAN. Certainly."

The reporter read as follows:

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I would like to ask, Mr. Roberts, whether this obligation or ceremony to which you refer in the endowment house relates entirely to things spiritual or whether it relates to things temporal also?

"Mr. ROBERTS. I regard them as relating to things spiritual, absolutely.

"Mr. TAYLER. If we were in a court of justice, and insisted upon it, I think that opens the door so wide that the whole oath would come in.

"The CHAIRMAN. I think so, too.

"Mr. TAYLER. But I do not care to do it." (1; 745, 746.)

The next witness called on behalf of the protestants was A. M. Cannon. After his examination by counsel for the protestants was concluded he was further examined by the chairman of the committee on this subject, and his testimony was as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the covenant you took when you went through the endowment house?

"Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Could you state the ceremony?

"Mr. CANNON. I would not like to.

"The CHAIRMAN. Why not?

"Mr. CANNON. Because it is of a religious character, and it is simply an obligation that I enter into to be pure before my Maker and worthy of the attainment of my Redeemer and the fellowship and love of my children and their mothers, my departed ancestry, and my coming descendants.

"The CHAIRMAN. What objection is there to making that public?

"Mr. CANNON. Because it is sacred.

"The CHAIRMAN. How sacred?

"Mr. CANNON. It is simply a covenant that I enter into with my Maker in private.

"The CHAIRMAN. All the tenets of your religion are sacred, are they not?

"Mr. CANNON. Sir?

"The CHAIRMAN. They are all sacred, are they not—the teachings?

"Mr. CANNON. All of those are sacred; yes, all of those things.

"The CHAIRMAN. I do not quite understand why you should keep them secret.

"Mr. CANNON. It is because it is necessary to keep them secret. If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, we admit only the purest of our people to enter there.

"The CHAIRMAN. People like you and the president of the church? I suppose the president of the church is admitted?

"Mr. CANNON. The presidency of the church, if he continues in good standing, and our people whoever are in good standing and deemed worthy of the proper recommends are permitted to enter there.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you enter into any obligation not to reveal these ceremonies?

"Mr. CANNON. I feel it would be very improper to reveal them.

"The CHAIRMAN. I say, do you enter into any obligation not to?

"Mr. CANNON. There are sacred obligations connected with all the higher ordinances of the church.

"The CHAIRMAN. In words, do you promise not to reveal?

"Mr. CANNON. I feel that that is the trust reposed in me, that I will not go and——

"The CHAIRMAN. I think you do not understand my question. Do you promise specifically not to reveal what occurs in the endowment house?

"Mr. CANNON. I would rather not tell what occurs there. I say this——

"The CHAIRMAN. I think, Mr. Cannon, you do not understand me. Do you promise not to reveal what occurs in the endowment house when you go through?

"Mr. CANNON. I feel that that is an obligation I take upon me when I do that.

"The CHAIRMAN. When you go through the endowment house do you take that obligation upon you in express terms?

"Mr. CANNON. I think I do.

"The CHAIRMAN. You know, do you not, whether you do or not? Why do you take that obligation not to reveal these things?

"Mr. CANNON. Because we are—I do not want to be disrespectful to this committee.

"The CHAIRMAN. I know you would not be.

"Mr. CANNON. The Lord gave us to understand that we should not make common the sacred things that He committed to His disciples. He told them they must not do that lest they trample them under their feet and rend them.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember whether there was any penalty attached if they should reveal?

"Mr. CANNON. I do not remember that there is any penalty.

"The CHAIRMAN. None whatever?

"Mr. CANNON. I do not remember.

"The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any change in the ceremony of the endowment house since you went through in 1859, up to the present time, that you are aware of?

"Mr. CANNON. No.

"The CHAIRMAN. No change in the ceremony or obligations?

"Mr. CANNON. No." (1; 791, 792.)

The next witness called by the protestants was Moses Thatcher. After counsel for the protestants had finished their examination of Mr. Thatcher, the following occurred:

"The CHAIRMAN. One other question: The endowment house, I believe, has been taken down?

"Mr. THATCHER. That is as I understand it. It has been taken down.

"The CHAIRMAN. Has the ceremony of the endowment house been wiped out also, or is that performed now?

"Mr. THATCHER. I am just trying to think whether I have been through the temple, in the light in which I went through the endowment house, to give you a correct answer on that, but my impressions are that the ceremoney has not been changed.

"The CHAIRMAN. You have seen the ceremony in the temple? You have witnessed it?

"Mr. THATCHER. I think I have heard it.

"The CHAIRMAN. And you think there is no change in it?

"Mr. THATCHER. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. When did you go through the endowment house?

"Mr. THATCHER. My impressions are when I married the wife of my youth—in 1861.

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the ceremony in the endowment house? I do not mean the ceremony of marriage; but did you go through the endowment house when you became an apostle?

"Mr. THATCHER. No, sir; it was not necessary.

"The CHAIRMAN. You have been through the endowment house, then, but once?

"Mr. THATCHER. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the ceremony of the endowment house?

"Mr. THATCHER. I think, Mr. Chairman, that I might be excused on that.

"The CHAIRMAN. Why?

"Mr. THATCHER. For the reason that those were held to be sacred matters and only pertaining to religious vows.

"The CHAIRMAN. Are you obligated not to reveal them?

"Mr. THATCHER. Yes; I think I am.

"The CHAIRMAN. What would be the effect if you should disclose them? That is, is there any penalty attached?

"Mr. THATCHER. There would be no effect except upon my own conscience.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is all?

"Mr. THATCHER. That is all.

"The CHAIRMAN. But you are under obligation as a part of the ceremony not to reveal it?

"Mr. THATCHER. Yes, sir; I feel myself under such obligation." (1; 1048, 1049.)

This was all the testimony on the subject of the alleged oath or obligation taken during the sessions of the committee held in the spring of 1904. The last session when testimony was taken during that spring occurred on the 2d of May, 1904. When the taking of testimony was resumed in December, 1904, counsel for the protestants produced and examined certain witnesses on this subject, the substance of whose testimony will now be stated.

J. H. Wallis, sr., who had been a Mormon but who had formally notified the bishop of his ward, seven or eight months before he was examined, that he no longer considered himself a member of the church, testified that on several occasions he had taken his endowments in the temple at Salt Lake City. When first examined he said that he did not know whether he had it exactly right, but that the substance of the so-called "oath of vengeance" is that those who took it promised and vowed that they "will never cease to importune High Heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets on the nations of the earth or the inhabitants of the earth." He added that if his memory served him, he thought that was about right, and that a passage of scripture is quoted from the Revelations, sixth chapter, ninth verse. (2; 79.)

The next day Mr. Wallis was recalled and testified that in repeating the obligation he had made a mistake; and that he should have said "upon this nation" instead of "upon the inhabitants of the earth." (2; 148.)

Two witnesses were called on behalf of the respondent to impeach Wallis. One of them, Moroni Gillespie, who had been a member of the police force in Salt Lake City for eleven or twelve years, testified that he knew Wallis's general reputation for truth and veracity in the community in which he lived; that it was bad; and that he would not believe him under oath. Wallis had testified that he had never been arrested.

This witness testified that he was present in the police court on one occasion when Wallis was under arrest and plead guilty to the charge of drunkenness. Gillespie further testified that he had known Wallis for several years and that, in his opinion, he was not altogether of sound mind. (3; 317, 318.)

The other witness as to the veracity of Wallis was William Langton. (2, 1022; 3, 143, 144.) Neither his testimony nor that of Gillespie was contradicted or impaired in any way. His conclusion, from what he had seen of Wallis, was that the man was crazy. He further testified that, in his opinion, Wallis's general reputation for truth and veracity was such that he would not believe him on oath.

When Langton was asked by counsel for the respondent to give his reasons for thinking that Wallis was of unsound mind, objection was made by the counsel for the protestants and the objection was sustained. (3; 144.) But subsequently he was recalled and allowed to give his reasons, which he did at length. (3; 445.)

August W. Lundstrom, another witness for the protestants, testified that he had taken the endowment six times, and that the obligation in question was:

"We and each of us solemnly promise and covenant that we shall ask God to avenge the blood of Joseph Smith upon this nation." (2; 151–153.)

He subsequently slightly varies this statement by saying that the prayer was: "We ask God, the Eternal Father, to avenge the blood of Joseph Smith upon this nation." (2; 161.)

Three witnesses were called on behalf of the respondent to impeach Lundstrom. One of them, F. S. Fernstrom, testified that he had known Lundstrom for about fourteen years, and Lundstrom's general reputation for truth in the community in which he lived was bad, and that he, witness, would not believe him under oath. On cross-examination by counsel for the protestants the fact was brought out that Lundstrom had borrowed from his bishop part of a fund which the bishop had collected for the support of the poor, and that when asked by the bishop to return the money, Lundstrom refused to do it, saying that the church owed him a living. (2; 1012.)

One of these witnesses, C. V. Anderson, testified that he knew Lundstrom's general reputation for veracity in Salt Lake City, where he lived; that it was bad, and that the witness did not think he would believe Lundstrom on oath. (2; 1013.)

J. H. Hayward was the third witness on this subject. He testified that he had known Lundstrom for many years, the latter having been at one time in his employ; that he knew Lundstrom's general reputation for truth and veracity in Salt Lake City, where he lived; that it was bad, and that from his reputation the witness would not believe him under oath.

This evidence as to Lundstrom's reputation for truth and veracity was not rebutted in any way.

The third and last witness called by the protestants, during the sessions of the committee held in December, 1904, on this subject of the alleged obligation was Mrs. Annie Elliott, who testified that she had taken the endowments several times, and that during the ceremony "they told me to pray and never cease to pray to get revenge for the blood of the prophets on this nation, and also teach it to my children and children's children." (2; 189.)

On cross-examination this witness stated positively that she had never told anybody about this obligation, and that if Mr. Tayler was examining her from a memorandum informing him what her testimony would be she did not know where it came from or how Mr. Tayler came to get it (2; 194). On her direct examination Mrs. Elliott stated that she was married in Denmark, and that her husband followed her to this country. Her examination by counsel for the protestants then proceeded as follows:

"Mr. TAYLER. Is he living now—that is, the husband whom you married in Denmark?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. No, sir.

"Mr. TAYLER. You lived with him until he died, did you?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. Yes, sir.

"Mr. TAYLER. Where did he die?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. Why, in Elsinore.

"Mr. TAYLER. In Utah?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. Yes, sir.

"Mr. TAYLER. When?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. In 1897.

"Mr. TAYLER. Did you, after his death, marry?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. Yes, sir; I married in 1899." (2; 184.)

On her cross-examination, after she had testified that she had left the church in 1897, the following occurred:

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Was it before or after the death of your first husband?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. Why, it was after.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. What time in 1897 did he die?

"Mrs. ELLIOTT. He died in October." (2; 191.)

The value of the testimony of this witness may be judged by the fact that the husband who followed her to this country not only did not die in October, 1897, but was living at the time Mrs. Elliott gave the testimony in question, and was subsequently called as a witness on behalf of the respondent (2; 1015). He testified that she had obtained a divorce from him about six years before he gave his testimony, which was in January, 1905. His testimony showed clearly that she knew he was living when she said he was dead.

On behalf of the respondent a number of witnesses were examined on this subject, and the substance of their testimony is as follows:

Hugh M. Dougall, who is a farmer and cattle grower, and is postmaster at the town of Springville, in Utah, was expelled from the Mormon Church about 1874, and since then has not been in any way connected with it. He took his endowments when he was about 25 years old.

He testified that according to his recollection the obligation was, in substance, that those who took it importuned heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets and the martyrs on this generation, and that he did not remember the name of Joseph Smith being mentioned at all. (2; 759.)

Mr. Dougall was subsequently recalled, and asked by Senator KNOX this question:

"Are you willing to say whether the vow obligated you to anything incompatible with your giving full and supreme allegiance to the United States or the State of Utah, or which obligated you to anything incompatible with your fully performing your duty as a citizen of the United States and that State?"

He answered: "Not one thing." (2; 781.)

Alonzo A. Noon left the Mormon Church voluntarily about 1870, when he was 32 years of age, having taken his endowments when he was 28 or 30 years old. He stated that there was nothing in the ceremony about promising or vowing to importune heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets on this nation, and that there was nothing in the ceremony which in any way imported hostility to the United States or to the Government thereof. That he was perfectly clear about that.

He also said he did not remember that the name of Joseph Smith was used in the ceremony. He did recollect that there was in the ceremony a quotation from the Scriptures, and upon hearing read verses 9 and 10, chapter 6, of the Revelations, he said that it was something like that; that that was about the intent.

One of these verses, it will be remembered, was referred to by the witness Wallis.

The two verses are as follows:

"Nine. And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held.

"Ten. And they cried with a loud voice saying: How long, Oh, Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth." (774.)

Being asked whether there was anything in the obligation which indicated hostility to the Government, Mr. Noon said:

"The very reverse. I have never heard any people taught only loyalty to the Government of the United States." (2; 775.)

Mr. Noon was recalled and asked the same question that had been propounded by Senator KNOX to Mr. Dougall, and he answered the question in the same way. (2; 781.)

William Hatfield, who was a Mormon until he was 23 years of age, after which he drifted away from that church, when he was not quite 21 years of age took his endowments as a preliminary to his marriage. (2; 785.)

He said that neither he nor any others in his hearing took the obligation which Wallis had testified to, and that he did not at that time take any obligation or enter into any covenant, vow, or agreement of any kind inconsistent with his duties as a citizen of the Territory of Utah or of the United States. He was not cross-examined. (2; 796.)

John P. Meakin, who was a Mormon until he was 23 or 24 years of age, left the church because he did not believe in polygamy. (2; 796.)

He went through the Endowment House when he was 18 years old. He stated that he had no recollection at all of any obligation of vengeance or retribution, and that nothing took place at the time with reference to promising or vowing to importune heaven to avenge the blood of the prophets on this nation, or to avenge the blood of Joseph Smith on anybody; that there was nothing took place which imported any obligation in opposition to his duty as a citizen either of the Territory of Utah or of the United States; that he was very clear about this. (799.)

He also said that there was nothing in the endowment ceremony about praying the Almighty to avenge the blood of the prophets on this generation. (2; 801.)

Elias A. Smith, cashier of the Desert Savings Bank, in Salt Lake City, in answer to a question by the chairman, stated that he had conscientious scruples against divulging any part of the endowment ceremony (2; 854); but in answer to a question by Senator FORAKER he said there was nothing in any obligation of the church which it imposed upon its members, in connection with marriage or any other occasion, inconsistent with fidelity as citizens of the National Government or to the State government. Mr. Smith persisted that while he had stated what was not in the obligation he did not feel at liberty to state what was in it. (2; 855.)

Richard W. Young, who was a graduate of West Point and of the law school of Columbia College, New York City, and who had served in the Volunteer Army in the Spanish war, in the Philippines, and elsewhere, is a member of the Mormon Church, and is not a polygamist. (2; 950–952.) He was asked by the chairman if he had any objection to disclosing what took place during the endowment ceremony, and he replied that he considered himself under an obligation not to do so. (2; 969.)

He was asked later by counsel for the respondent if he had any objection to stating whether the ceremony included, in any form or shape, any invocation of vengeance or retribution against this nation. Senator McCOMAS suggested that the witness should state the whole ceremony or nothing. Thereupon an extended argument was made, at the end of which the witness was asked by counsel for the respondent:

"In that ceremony is there anything which relates to your duties or obligations to your Government or to this nation."

The chairman ruled that if the witness should answer this question he would be required to state the whole ceremony, and thereupon the witness declined to answer it. (2; 981–985.)

REED SMOOT testified positively that there is nothing in the endowment ceremony about avenging the blood of the prophets or avenging anything else on this nation or on this Government. (3; 183, 184.)

As already stated, the case was reopened during the present session of Congress for the purpose of allowing the introduction of further testimony on behalf of the protestants, and four additional witnesses were produced with reference to the matter of the alleged obligation. No further testimony on the subject was taken on behalf of the respondent.

The four witnesses referred to were W. J. Thomas, J. P. Holmgrem, H. W. Lawrence, and W. M. Wolfe.

The witness Thomas testified that he passed the endowment house in 1869. His examination on this subject was as follows:

"Mr. CARLISLE. I have asked you about whether any ceremonies took place before the oath or obligation took place? If so, state what it was.

"Mr. THOMAS. There were washings and anointings there.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Describe to the committee what you mean by anointing. Was your whole body anointed or your arm anointed; and, if so, was anything said when that was done?

"Mr. THOMAS. My head was anointed and my right arm. I do not remember anything else.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Was anything said by the person who conducted these ceremonies at the time he anointed your right arm? Were you told what it was for?

"Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; he spoke very quick and I couldn't catch it all, but I remember when he anointed my arm to make it strong, and the substance of it was that I would avenge the blood of the prophets—prophet or prophets. I believe it was the plural. (4; 69.)

* * * * * * *

"Senator KNOX. You took this vow in what year?

"Mr. THOMAS. In 1869.

"Senator KNOX. How long did you remain in the church after that?

"Mr. THOMAS. I remained in the church up until 1880.

"Senator KNOX. That was eleven years; and you vowed to avenge the blood of the martyrs upon this nation, did you?

"Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

"Senator KNOX. And your right arm was anointed to give you strength that you might do so. Is that correct?

"Mr. THOMAS. That is the way I understood it.

"Senator KNOX. What did you ever do in the line of keeping that vow? Did you ever avenge the blood of the martyrs upon this nation?

"Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. I have enlisted twice to try and defend the nation.

"Senator KNOX. Were you ever stirred up by the authorities of the church to get busy in that direction of avenging the blood of the martyrs upon this nation?

"Mr. THOMAS. No.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Do you know of any member of the church who did do anything in the way of using his right arm to avenge the blood of the prophets on this nation?

"Mr. THOMAS. No, sir." (4; 71, 72.)

The witness Holmgren on this subject testified that he passed through the endowment house in 1889. His further examination on this subject is as follows:

"Mr. CARLISLE. Do you remember the ceremonies that took place at that time?

"Mr. HOLMGREN. Part of it.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Are you willing to state the oath that was taken, or not? If you are not, I shall not press you.

"Mr. HOLMGREN. What I understood and heard of it—sure.

"Mr. CARLISLE. In the first place, what occurred?

"Mr. HOLMGREN. In the endowment house?

"Mr. CARLISLE. Yes.

"Mr. HOLMGREN. There were a number of oaths and performances that were insignificant, I would say, until we came to the anointing room, and in that anointing room there was some language used that I am sorry I ever heard.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Can you state what it was?

"Mr. HOLMGREN. In anointing my arms, the gentleman used this language: 'That your arms might be strong to avenge the blood of Joseph and Hyrum Smith.'" (4; 76, 77.)

The witness Lawrence, who was 70 years old at the time he testified, stated that he was a member of the Mormon Church until 1869, and that he had taken or administered the alleged obligation in question a number of times. The following are the substantial parts of his testimony on this point:

"Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Lawrence, would you object to stating whether there is any oath, commonly called here the oath of vengeance, taken in the endowment house, and what it is?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes; there is.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Can you state it in terms or in substance?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. 'You covenant and agree before God and angels and these witnesses that you will avenge the blood of the prophets, the prophet Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, Parley P. Pratt, David Patton'—their names are mentioned.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Was that the case when you took the endowment?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir. I do not know whether they were all mentioned when I was there or not, but they have been mentioned when I have been there.

"Mr. CARLISLE. You have passed through the endowment a number of times?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes; I have been there a number of times.

"Mr. CARLISLE. You mean these names have been mentioned some of the times when you passed through? That is what you mean?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. CARLISLE. You do not know whether they were all mentioned at the same time or not?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. No, sir.

"Senator DILLINGHAM. Do I understand the witness has given the whole of the obligation,

"Mr. CARLISLE. I will ask him. Do you remember now whether there was anything said about vengeance upon the people or vengeance upon the nation, or what was said of that sort, if you remember?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I say it has been stated. I can not state it only as I understand it. The word 'nation' was not mentioned where I was in regard to that vengeance, but the feeling has always been against the nation and the State for allowing that deed to be perpetrated. The word 'nation' was not mentioned. It is a little ambiguous in regard to that.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. You say you are ambiguous or it was ambiguous?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. It was a little ambiguous there who it should be executed on. The supposition is it should be executed on the perpetrators of the deed.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Lawrence, I will get you to state, if you can, whether this covenant, or oath, or whatever it may be called, is always administered by the same person and in the same terms, or whether it is administered at different times by different persons, and whether it is in writing or merely oral.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. It is administered orally by different persons at different times.

"Mr. CARLISLE. It may be, then, that there is a different form of the oath?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. It may be administered a little different. Of course the substance is about the same, but there may be some men who administer it a little different from others. I have no doubt that it is, from what I have heard.

"Mr. CARLISLE. You may take the witness.

"Senator KNOX. Was this vengeance to be executed by the person taking the oath, or vow, or were you to implore the Almighty to avenge the blood of the prophets?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. As I say, it was a little ambiguous in regard to that. Of course you take an oath to avenge the blood of the prophets and teach the principle to your children and children's children.

"Senator KNOX. I think you do not understand me. You stated a moment ago that there was some ambiguity in the oath as to whom the vengeance is directed against.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes.

"Senator KNOX. Now, I am asking you who it was who was to execute the vengeance. Was the person taking the vow, or oath, to execute it or were they to implore by prayer that God should take this vengeance?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, that was not inserted in it for the Lord to do it. They simply took upon themselves the oath to do it; but I say it is almost impossible for them to wreak vengeance, because those men that committed the deed have probably gone years ago.

"Senator KNOX. My question was based on the exact language used by Professor Wolfe yesterday. He said that he heard the oath taken very recently, and that they vowed or promised that they would pray to Almighty God to avenge the blood of the prophets. I think it is quite material, and I want to know what your recollection is about it.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. That was not inserted in my day—that is, in regard to asking God to wreak this vengeance. (4; 108, 109.)

* * * * * * *

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Tell us about how many times you were present when this oath was administered.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I could not say. It would go into the hundreds, probably.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Several hundred times?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes; or dozens. I would say from one to three years, probably.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. And on each occasion to a great many people, I suppose.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. On all the occasions when you heard it administered to others, or when it was administered to you, did you ever hear any reference to the nation of the United States as the object of vengeance?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. During my administration the word 'nation' was not used.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Do you mean you administered the oath?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. No, sir; yes, sir. I mean I officiated there with the rest of them.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Then you both administered the covenant, and you heard others administer it?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. You administered it hundreds of times, and you heard it administered hundreds of times; is that right?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I was there off and on for one or two years.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Did you administer it hundreds of times?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I will say yes. (4; 110, 111.)

* * * * * * *

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Now, I come back. During all the time you administered the oath, or heard it administered by others, did you ever hear the 'nation' or the 'United States' or the 'Government of the United States' referred to in any way as the object of vengeance that was the subject of that covenant?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I will say that, at that time, it was not connected with the obligation. I will say this, that the Government has always been blamed for allowing that deed to be perpetrated.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Don't let us depart from the ceremony. I want to find out what took place at the ceremony when you administered the covenant. Did you administer it always in the same language?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I tried to, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Where did you learn it?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I learned it from the church ritual, I suppose. It was what was given to me.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Was it something that was in writing or was it in print?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. No, sir; not in writing.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. It was communicated to you orally and you committed it to memory, did you?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. You do not remember who gave it to you?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not remember just now.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. It was given to you as the traditional oath of the temple, was it not?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. It was given to me to use.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. You have said to Mr. Carlisle that there is no doubt that the language of the covenant was varied from time to time. Did you ever hear it given in any other form than that you have told us about?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes. I will explain that. I have said that there were different parties that officiated at different times, and from what I had heard they had changed it a little. Inasmuch as it was orally given, one man would administer it a little different from others.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. You know that by hearsay?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I know that by hearsay only. (4; 111, 112.)

* * * * * * *

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Referring to this ceremony, and the covenant of vengeance, as it is called, do you remember in that connection whether there was any passage in the Book of Revelations of the Bible?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. What is that?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. That is used in connection with this as a justification for it.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Can you give us the verse and chapter of Revelations?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I think it is a chapter from Revelations. It is probably chapter 6. It is taken from Revelations. It is simply referred to. I will answer that that quotation is referred to.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. Was it not a part of the teaching of the church, when you were connected with it, that the Constitution of the United States is an inspired document?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir. Do you want an answer to that?

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I have all the answer I care to have, sir. If there is anything you wish to add or take from the effect of your testimony, you have that privilege, provided it is not a speech. Let me read the ninth and tenth verses of the sixth chapter of Revelations, and see if those——

"Mr. LAWRENCE. 'How long, O Lord?' It is just a quotation.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. I will read the two, and see if those two verses, or either of them, are the ones to which you refer:

"'And when he had opened the fifth seal I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain by the Word of God, and by the testimony which they held.

"'And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, Holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?'

"Mr. LAWRENCE. That is part of it in connection with this?

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. We should like to have the whole of it. Just show us all that was referred to in your ceremony there.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. 'How long, O Lord, Holy and true.'

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. 'Dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?'

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I think that was the part connected with it—just that part.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. You say that was used as a justification of the covenant, in connection with it?

"Mr. LAWRENCE. That was used as a justification of the obligation.

"The CHAIRMAN. He did not say as a justification of the covenant.

"Mr. LAWRENCE. I said that was used as a justification of the obligation." (4; 116, 117.)

It will be seen that all three of these witnesses flatly contradicted what seems to be the theory of the protestants, that the obligation in question involved a promise on the part of the party going through the ceremony hostile to the United States or an appeal to the Almighty to inflict punishment on the nation.

The other witness on the point now under consideration is W. M. Wolfe. He testified that he had passed through the endowment house no less than twelve times, the first time being in May, 1894, and the last time in October, 1902. His examination on this subject then proceeded as follows:

"Mr. CARLISLE. Will you state to the committee whether there is, as part of the ceremonies in the temple, any oath administered?

"Mr. WOLFE. There are several oaths administered.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Can you state what they are?

"Mr. WOLFE. There is an oath of chastity, or, I might say, a covenant or law—a law of sacrifice and a law of vengeance.

"Mr. CARLISLE. When you say a law of vengeance, what do you mean? Do you mean that there is any promise or pledge to avenge a wrong, or do you mean simply that there is some law read to you, or some rule read to you?

"Mr. WOLFE. There is no covenant or agreement on the part of any individual to avenge anything.

"Mr. CARLISLE. Just state to the committee what it is.

"Mr. WOLFE. The law of vengeance is this: 'You and each of you do covenant and promise that you will pray, and never cease to pray, Almighty God to avenge the blood of the prophets upon this nation, and that you will teach the same to your children and your children's children unto the third and fourth generations.' At the conclusion the speaker says: 'All bow your heads and say "Yes."'

"Mr. CARLISLE. Was that done?

"Mr. WOLFE. It was done.

"Senator OVERMAN. Was that done every time, or just one time?

"Mr. WOLFE. It was done every time I went through." (4; 7.)

Mr. Wolfe, for several years, and up to January last, was one of the professors in the Brigham Young College, at Logan, a Mormon institution. When asked on cross-examination whether charges of drunkenness had not been preferred against him in the institution, he said that no such charges had been made, to his knowledge, but that such charges might have been preferred against him. Upon being asked what he meant by saying that such charges might have been preferred against him, he answered that he meant that he had made himself liable to such charges for a period of possibly twenty years. (4; 24.)

He admitted that certain officers of the institution had had conversations with him in regard to his habit of drinking (4; 25). He admitted that he had been required to resign his position in January last; but claimed that this was done because about that time he had given notice that he would no longer pay tithing. He admitted that officers of the institution had made objection to his habits of drinking, but said that they had never suggested his removal, or the desirability of his resignation until he had refused to pay tithes. (4; 26.)

As to Wolfe's testimony, the respondent offered considerable testimony in rebuttal. One of the witnesses on this subject was James H. Linford, the president of Brigham Young College. He testified fully as to Wolfe's habit of drinking for a considerable period prior to the time he was compelled to resign; and testified, in substance, that Wolfe's resignation was not demanded on account of his refusing to pay tithes, but because his habits of drinking had grown on him so that it was no longer possible to allow him to retain his position. (4; 261, 271.)

There was also filed on behalf of the respondent the affidavit of Joseph E. Cardon, the bishop of the ward at Logan, in which Wolfe lived. This affidavit was admitted as evidence by consent of counsel for the protestants, and by leave of the committee. In this affidavit the witness contradicts what Wolfe stated in his testimony with reference to a conversation with the witness on the subject of tithing.

Wolfe was also contradicted, in a very material part of his evidence, by four witnesses. He had preferred charges against one Benjamin Kluff, in connection with a certain expedition that had been made to Mexico, of which expedition Kluff was in charge, and Wolfe was a member. Wolfe testified that on that expedition he had seen Kluff living in marital relations with one Florence Reynolds, who is alleged to have been Kluff's plural wife, taken since the manifesto. Wolfe testified that, at the hearing of these charges before a church council, he had stated that he had seen Kluff and Florence Reynolds living in that relation.

By consent of counsel for the protestants, and by leave of the committee, there were filed the affidavit of the stenographer who took down Wolfe's statement, and the joint affidavit of the three members of the committee before whom he made his statement, all of them saying that he had not in any way referred to the fact that he had seen Kluff and Florence Reynolds living together, and that he did not in any way refer to the relations between those two people. (4; 302, 408, 409.)

Taking all of the testimony on this subject together, the overwhelming weight of it is against the contention that the respondent ever took any obligation of hostility to the United States. Seven witnesses have in an indefinite way testified that the obligation included some kind of a promise or prayer indicating hostility to the nation, while thirteen witnesses, about one-half of whom were called on behalf of the protestants, have testified positively and unqualifiedly to the contrary. All of the witnesses who have testified that the word "nation" was used in the obligation have been impeached as to their credibility, and no evidence has been introduced tending to sustain the veracity of any one of them.

Mr. FORAKER. It is understood, I believe, that the reports themselves are to be printed separately, as separate documents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And 10,000 copies of each.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURROWS. If the Senator will yield to me just a moment, I desire to state that I shall call this matter up at the earliest possible moment consistent with the public business.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say that I join with the Senator making the majority report in that notice. This matter, we think, should be called up at the earliest moment possible, and I shall insist upon its being called up for consideration before final adjournment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I had intended this morning to add a brief statement to the report which has been submitted by the Senator from Michigan, but I was unable to reach his committee room in time to do that. I therefore desire to say, in order that it may appear in the RECORD, that while I concur in the conclusion of the majority that Senator SMOOT is not entitled to continue as a member of this body, it is my opinion that he can not be deprived of his seat, under the Constitution, except by expulsion.

The orders heretofore made were subsequently reduced to writing, as follows:

On motion of Mr. BURROWS, it was Ordered, That 10,000 additional copies of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, accompanying the resolution that REED SMOOT is not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Utah, be printed, 3,000 for the use of the committee and 7,000 for the use of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, it was Ordered, That 10,000 additional copies of the views of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, accompanying the resolution that REED SMOOT is not entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Utah, be printed, 3,000 for the use of the committee and 7,000 for the use of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BURROWS, it was Ordered, That the hearings had before the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the investigation of the right of REED SMOOT to a seat in the Senate from the State of Utah be printed as a document.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6119) for the protection of animals, birds, and fish in the forest reserves of California, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6384) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to examine and adjust the accounts of William R. Little, or his heirs, with the Sac and Fox Indians, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6364) to incorporate the National Child Labor Committee, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13190) to protect birds and their eggs in game and bird preserves, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 6440) granting an increase of pension to R. D. Gardner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6441) for the relief of William F. McKimmy, administrator of John McKimmy, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6442) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas P. Mathews; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MALLORY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 65) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to cause a survey of the Everglades of Florida, to determine the feasibility and cost of draining said Everglades, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at Half Moon Bay, south of Point Montara and near Montara Reef, California, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 for the construction of revenue cutter for service in the Bay of San Francisco, California, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $225,000 for the construction of a steam vessel of the first class for the Revenue-Cutter Service, at Honolulu, Hawaii, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment providing that jurisdiction in equity is hereby conferred upon the circuit court of the United States of the ninth circuit to examine and determine the rights of American citizens under the boards of the bureaus of arbitration concerning the jurisdiction of the Bering Sea, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 19264, being the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for the consideration of amendments, the committee amendments to be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriation for Schedule A, under the subhead "Salaries of ambassadors and ministers," on page 1, line 12, before the word "France," to insert "Brazil;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "Mexico," to strike out "and;" in the same line, after the word "Russia," to insert "and Turkey;" and in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary, Brazil, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, and Turkey, at $17,500 each, $175,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 3, to strike out:

Ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Brazil, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 7, after the word "Republic," to insert "Belgium;" in the same line, after the word "China," to insert "Cuba, the Netherlands and Luxemburg;" and, in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "seventy-two;" so as to make the clause read:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, China, Cuba, the Netherlands and Luxemburg, and Spain, at $12,000 each, $72,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 11, before the word "Chile," to strike out "Belgium;" in the same line, after the word "Colombia," to strike out "Cuba, the Netherlands and Luxemburg;" in line 12, after the word "Peru," to strike out "Turkey;" and in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ninety" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Chile, Colombia, Panama, Peru, and Venezuela, at $10,000 each, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 9 on page 3.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, line 9, after the word "Cairo," I move to strike out "five thousand" and insert "six thousand five hundred;" so as to read:

Agent and consul-general at Cairo, $6,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 14, to increase the total of the appropriations for salaries of ambassadors and ministers from $458,000 to $477,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This total will have to be changed.

Mr. LODGE. It should be $478,500.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the total will be changed to $478,500.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries of secretaries of embassies and legations," page 3, line 21, after the word "Republic," to insert "Belgium;" and in line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ten thousand five hundred" and insert "thirteen thousand one hundred and twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Secretaries of legations to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, China, the Netherlands and Luxemburg, and Turkey, at $2,625 each, $13,125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 1, before the word "Bolivia," to strike out "Belgium;" and in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "thirty-four;" so as to make the clause read:

Secretaries of legation to Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Guatemala and Honduras, Liberia, Morocco, Norway (to be immediately available), Panama, Peru, Portugal, Santo Domingo, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela, at $2,000 each, $34,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 8, to reduce the appropriation for the salary of the secretary of legation to Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and San Salvador from $2,800 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, to increase the total appropriation for salaries of secretaries of embassies and legations from $108,000 to $108,425.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Clerks at embassies and legations," on page 6, line 14, after the word "who," to insert "whenever hereafter appointed;" so as to make the clause read:

For the employment of necessary clerks at the embassies and legations, who, whenever hereafter appointed, shall be citizens of the United States, $65,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Salaries of interpreters to embassies and legations," on page 7, line 3, before the word "consulate-general," to strike out "legation and;" and in the same line, after the word "to," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Korea" and insert "Seoul;" so as to make the clause read:

Interpreter to consulate-general to Seoul, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Repair of consulate building at Tahiti, Society Islands," on page 9, line 23, after the word "For," to strike out "the repair of" and insert "rebuilding;" and in line 24, after the word "thousand," to insert "three hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For rebuilding the American consular building at Tahiti, Society Islands, $5,371.45.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 5, to insert:

REPORTS RELATIVE TO THE WORK OF THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

For the preparation of reports and material necessary to enable the Secretary of State to utilize and carry on the work partly performed by the Joint High Commission of 1898, for the settlement of questions between the United States and Great Britain relating to Canada, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 14, to insert:

BOUNDARY LINE, ALASKA AND CANADA.

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary, and make the surveys incidental thereto, between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, $25,000, together with the unexpended balance of the previous appropriations for this object.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 22, to insert:

BOUNDARY LINE, UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

For the more effective demarcation and mapping of the boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, near the forty-fifth parallel, from the Richelieu River to Halls Stream, as established by the commissioners of 1842 to 1848, under the treaty of Washington of August 9, 1842, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, and to be immediately available and continue available until expended, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 8, to insert:

ST. JOHN RIVER COMMISSION.

For the expenses of a joint commission, to be constituted if the Government of Great Britain concurs, to investigate and report upon the conditions and uses of the St. John River, and to make recommendations for the regulation of the use thereof by the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain, according to the provisions of treaties between the two countries, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 16, to insert:

CONSULAR BUILDINGS IN CHINA, KOREA, AND JAPAN.

The Secretary of State shall report to Congress at its next session a plan in detail covering provisions for the purchase of ground and the erection of buildings for consular offices in China, Korea, and Japan, and estimates shall be submitted for the same, showing the amount required at each place, the total sum for all such buildings not to exceed $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 17, to insert:

PURCHASE OF LEGATION PREMISES IN CONSTANTINOPLE, TURKEY.

For the purchase of the buildings and grounds now occupied by the legation of the United States in Constantinople, Turkey, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for Schedule B, under the subhead "Salaries, consular service," on page 17, after line 17, to insert:

For salary of consul-general at Boma, Kongo Free State, class 5, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 19, to insert:

For salary of consul at Calgary, Canada, class 9, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Expenses of consular inspectors," on page 18, line 1, to increase the appropriation for the actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of consular inspectors while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State from $10,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items of Schedule C, under the subhead "Allowances for clerk hire at United States consulates," on page 20, line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "one thousand;" and in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred and fifty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Allowance for clerks at consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State at consulates not herein provided for in respect to clerk hire, no greater portion of this sum than $1,000 to be allowed to any one consulate in any one fiscal year, $155,000: Provided, That the total sum expended in one year shall not exceed the amount appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Expenses of interpreters, guards, and so forth, in Turkish dominions, and so forth," on page 21, line 2, to increase the appropriation for interpreters and guards at the consulates in the Turkish Dominions and at Zanzibar, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, from $10,000 to $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses, United States consulates," on page 23, line 6, to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses, United States consulates, from $300,000 to $350,000.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18024) for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, and for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. MORGAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS IN MONTANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and accede to the request of the House for a conference, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. CLARK of Montana, Mr. DUBOIS, and Mr. CLAPP as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19144. An act granting an increase of pension to Sarah Louisa Sheppard was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of the conference report on House bill 15331, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment to make an inquiry?

Mr. CLAPP. I will yield as soon as the conference report is taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

cial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Del Rio, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes.

REPORT ON ALASKAN SCHOOLS, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of May 31, requesting the President, "if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the Senate with a copy of the report of the investigation made in 1905, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, by Special Agent Frank C. Churchill, regarding the condition of educational and school service and the management of reindeer service in the District of Alaska, together with all exhibits accompanying said report," I transmit herewith copies of the original and supplemental reports of Mr. Churchill, dated, respectively, December 11, 1905; January 10, February 15, and June 2, 1906, together with all the exhibits accompanying the same.

I also inclose a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting the papers for transmission to the Senate.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 11, 1906.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I see the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the Chamber, and I desire to call his attention, and the attention of the Senate also, and to make an inquiry of him in regard to the resolution which I submitted on the 16th of April, and which was referred to the Committee on Finance the following day. In order that Senators may understand what is involved, I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN April 16, 1906, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire whether or not the national banks have made contributions in aid of political committees, and if so to what extent and why the facts have not been discovered by the Comptroller of the Currency; and whether or not such contributions have been embezzlements, abstractions, or willful misapplications of the funds of the banks which call for restitutions and criminal prosecutions. Said committee is also directed to inquire whether or not the national banks of Chicago have recently engaged in transactions beyond their lawful powers in connection with the recent failure of a bank in that city, and whether such failure involved illegalities and crimes; and also to inquire whether the national banks in Ohio have been in the habit of paying large sums of money in a secret and illicit manner to the county treasurers of Ohio as a compensation to said treasurers for making deposits of public money with such banks; and to report the facts to the Senate and the opinion of the committee whether any legal proceedings should be instituted on account of the transactions disclosed; and whether the public interest requires any amendments of the existing national banking laws.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, Senators will remember that at the time this resolution was presented to the Senate I made some remarks in regard to it and called attention to the general mismanagement, as it appeared to me, or looseness of management, of national banks. I proved practically that there were campaign contributions contrary to law, and in that discussion the case of John R. Walsh's bank in Chicago was rather prominently brought forward. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] seemed to take great umbrage that I should presume to meddle with a bank in his home city and—well, if I had been willing to so consider it, he used language which was insulting. He advanced the remarkable doctrine or dogma that because South Carolinians were accustomed to lynch negroes for rape, and because I had announced and declared on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere that in 1876 we shot negroes and stuffed ballot boxes to carry the elections in order to regain control of our State and protect our civilization, it was prefectly permissible for people in Chicago to go on stealing without any question from me, and for national bankers to disobey the law as they saw fit. I am merely giving the outline of the Senator's argument, and I have no desire in mentioning it to renew that unpleasant discussion, though I am ready at any time.

My purpose this morning is to make inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Finance as to whether this resolution has been considered, or whether it will be considered, or whether there is any purpose to take up this investigation and follow it or not.

As a further argument or reason why there should be an investigation, a very thorough investigation, and at the earliest possible moment, I send to the desk and ask to have read an article in the New York Sun of June 6, relating to the condition in Chicago now in regard to the Walsh bank, and the situation in which the clearing-house association of Chicago finds itself in connection with the Walsh bank, and the assumption by that association of all of the Walsh debts. It will throw a great deal of light on the present situation, and I think will emphasize the necessity for action by the Finance Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RECEIVER FOR WALSH ROADS—BANKERS WHO LIQUIDATED HIS BANKS SEE NO OTHER SOLUTION.

CHICAGO, June 5, 1906.

Receivership proceedings against the railroads of John R. Walsh are imminent.

This became known to-day when it was revealed that there is dissension which amounts almost to open quarreling among the banks of the clearing-house association, which advanced more than $14,000,000 to liquidate the Chicago National and Home Savings banks last December. Members of the clearing-house committee, managing directors of the Walsh deal, are divided into two factions, unable to agree on the course to take to clear the banks of the Walsh tangle.

The demand for a receivership became insistent a few days ago, when it became known to the associated banks that the financial affairs of the Southern Indiana, Chicago Southern, and Illinois Southern roads are in a bad way.

"There has been a great deal of grumbling among the banks for some months," said a man in close touch with the situation through one of the most heavily interested banks to-day. "Ever since the deal to sell the Walsh roads fell through in New York grumbling has grown louder. The bankers are not satisfied to have their money tied up in a venture which looks more hopeless every day. The only course open to give relief seems to be a receivership for the roads."

The Southern Indiana is the only road of the Walsh group which has shown earning capabilities. No financial statement was ever made of the Chicago Southern or the Southern Illinois. The Southern Indiana, according to its last annual statement, was making enough to pay interest on its indebtedness and 1½ per cent on its stock. Since the coal strike was declared on May 1, the bankers have learned, the Southern Indiana has not been a paying property.

On top of the banks' other troubles has come a report that Secretary of the Treasury Shaw gave strong intimation to national bankers that they should unload the bonds of Walsh's roads now carried as assets of their institutions.

There remain something like $12,000,000 of Walsh paper and securities in the associated banks. It has become clear to the banks, according to one of their attorneys, that in reserving the stock in his railways, which they thought of little consequence, Walsh made them victims of a sharp trick. The stock carries the voting power and control of the roads. As long as the roads pay interest on bonds Walsh will be in command of the situation. He will dictate the policy of the railways and their management.

The banks are left "holding the bag."

When Walsh's banks went out of business, it is asserted he transferred to a bank whose president is on the clearing-house committee all the accounts of his railroads and other interests, amounting to many thousands of dollars. This bank president is reported to be standing by Walsh in the present crisis and seeking to avert the threatened receivership.

Work on the investigation of the criminal charges made against Walsh is progressing rapidly in the office of District Attorney C. B. Morrison. Special Bank Examiner Moxey, who is inspecting the bank and railroad company books, conferred with Mr. Morrison to-day. Assistant Attorney-General Pagin has seen all of the evidence thus far gathered, so as to be ready to draw an indictment should the case progress that far.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is well understood by those who read the newspapers that after the efforts which were made to secure the dismissal of the charges against Mr. Walsh before the United States commissioner failed and he was bound over to court to await the action of the grand jury people expected this financial tangle in Chicago to be straightened out. The "admirable financiering" which elicited so much commendation from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has failed to accomplish that purpose, and the money of the banks which are in the clearing-house association is tied up. We find that, instead of being able to sell the railroads to liquidate the debts of Mr. Walsh and get things straightened out, the valuation of the roads, which in the last newspaper article I read on the subject was, I think, placed at about twenty-one or twenty-two million dollars, has now shrunk so that no one knows what they are worth, and if knocked off under the hammer it seems as if the chances are for a very large loss to the banks, which may cause further embarrassment. I have nothing to do with that. I do not know whether these statements are true or not, and I do not care. What I want is to have this subject investigated, as I said before when I brought this matter forward, without any special parade or hurrah, because I thought it was a legitimate subject for inquiry. I should like to have the Finance Committee seriously consider the propriety and necessity for examining into the facts and determining once for all what is necessary to be done, and, as the resolution has pointed out, to see that the laws of the United States are obeyed by the national banks, so that this kind of wild-cat proceeding shall not be repeated somewhere else.

Mr. CLAPP and Mr. HOPKINS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENNT. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CLAPP. I had no idea this resolution would lead to debate, but I will yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I do not propose to take very much of the time of the Senate, but I desire to call the attention of Senators to the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that he has no knowledge as to whether the statement made in the article which he has had read is true or false. If that is the only information which he has, it is not such information as men rely upon in a great financial transaction such as is there represented.

I desire again to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that every depositor in the Walsh bank was paid one hundred cents on the dollar; that everybody who has had any connection with the bank as a depositor or any relation with it in a financial way has been paid in full, and that there are assets enough to pay the full book value to every stockholder in the bank.

The article shows, if I remember its statement, that the Chicago banks advanced something like $14,000,000, and took the bonds and stocks of those various railroads as security in order to finance the situation. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that I was told by one of those bankers that they had a standing offer of $22,500,000 for those properties. So that will leave a large margin, after paying these banks, to go to Mr. Walsh and the other parties who are interested in the Walsh bank. Mr. Walsh and those interested with him regard these properties as worth from twenty-five to twenty-seven million dollars, and they have been insisting that the properties should not be sold for less than that sum.

The leading bankers there, who represent the great financial interests of Chicago, are in full accord with Mr. Walsh, as I understand, upon this proposition that these great properties, so valuable, as I have just indicated, shall not be sacrificed by any Wall street interest that might seek to depress their value. That is all there is to it. When somebody loses money out in Chicago on this question, it will be time enough for the Senator from South Carolina to characterize it as "wildcat banking;" but up to the present time it is shown that the banking there is of a character that precludes the idea that there should be a loss of a cent to anybody.

Mr. CLAPP and Mr. FRAZIER addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has asked me a question, which I should be glad to answer, if he desires an answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I do desire to hear something from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and to know whether he or the committee has considered this resolution, or whether they will consider it, or whether he thinks the committee—of course, unless the committee has considered it, he can not express any opinion as to what it will think or what it does think—but I should like to have an assurance from him that the committee will do something with the resolution, either adopt it or refer it back here for the Senate's action, or else make some report as to why it does not do it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAPP. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. One of the subjects included in the resolution is that in regard to contributions for political purposes. That has already been disposed of by the Senate, and that is, therefore, I suppose, out of the jurisdiction of the committee.

Of the other two matters in relation to national banks, I will say that the committee has been very busy of late and, therefore, have not taken those up, not supposing that there was any special haste in regard to them. The question the Senator from South Carolina now brings to the attention of the Senate has not been acted upon by the committee; but I will say that the committee meets to-morrow morning, and I will assure the Senator we will take the matter up.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is all I want. I simply do not want it to die here and that that anomalous condition in Chicago should continue. There must be some foundation for this statement, because the New York Sun is not a yellow journal; it is usually accurate in its news service; and its statement is that there are differences of opinion in the clearing house as to what should be done with these properties, and there may be wreckers in New York and elsewhere who would like to get these railroads so far wrecked and demoralized as to be able to buy them in at a sacrifice. But I am willing to have the committee investigate these matters and determine, once for all, whether the laws of the United States have been broken there and what laws ought to be enacted, if any, to protect the banks.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CLAPP. The conference report on the Indian appropriation bill is pending, and it can not be acted upon by the other House until the Senate first acts upon it. So I feel that it ought to be pressed to a conclusion; but I understand the bill which the Senator from Tennessee is anxious to have taken up is one merely to change the time for holding circuit and district courts in Tennessee and that both the bench and bar—the bill having passed the House—are interested in knowing what is to become of the bill, so that they may adjust their dates accordingly. In view of that, I make an exception and yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

TERMS OF COURT IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 6149, being a bill in relation to the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain districts of Tennessee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6149) to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary will be stated.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I will state that a bill has been passed by the other House on the same subject which is identical with the Senate bill. I therefore ask that the House bill may be taken up for consideration, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The House bill is not at the Secretary's desk. The Chair supposes it to be in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRAZIER. Then I ask that the consideration of the Senate bill may be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary report an amendment, to insert, as section 3, the following:

SEC. 3. That the clerks of said circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Tennessee may reside and keep their offices, respectively, in either the city of Knoxville, Chattanooga, or Greeneville; but said clerks shall each, respectively, appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices in each of the above-named cities other than the one in which said clerks shall respectively reside and keep their offices; that the said deputy clerks shall, in the absence of their principals, do and perform all the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the House bill has been sent for, and the Chair will recognize the Senator from Tennessee later. The action on the Senate bill will for the present be suspended.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] desires to be heard.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, late Saturday evening I brought to the attention of the Senate a matter which has twice before been considered by the Senate and which to me appears wholly indefensible. In order that Senators who were not present Saturday, and who have not read the RECORD, may understand somewhat what is involved, I will restate briefly my objections to having this conference report adopted by the Senate.

I know, Mr. President, of course, that it is practically a hopeless thing for a Senator to attempt to secure the rejection of such a report at this stage of the session. We are all working under pressure; we are tired, fatigued, and worn out with the long, laborious session, and when a matter has been considered in the Senate and then brought back in the shape of a conference report, the usual feeling of Senators is that it must be fairly reasonable and proper, and that it is to be accepted as the inevitable thing. Therefore I have small hope of getting Senators to vote to reject this report, although there are things in it which would warrant it being sent back to conference with instructions.

The particular item to which I wish to call attention is the matter of Andrew Jackson Brown and the Seminole Indians. In the bill which passed the Senate some six weeks or two months ago to finally dispose of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes there was an amendment put on by the Senate committee providing that—

> The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James D. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed: Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

Mr. President, I do not like to insist that Senators shall quit talking and listen, but I will insist because they are going to vote on this report presently and I am determined that they shall vote with their ears open, or their eyes open, anyhow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TILLMAN. This provision, which was inserted in the Five Civilized Tribes bill, ratified and legalized the action of Brown and Jenkins in disbursing this money. I was informed by a private letter from the Indian Territory that it was an outrageous proceeding; that many of the Indians had been cheated; that there were minors whose rights were involved, and that the Indian Department has instituted suit to protect those minors, and had employed an attorney to press the suits in the United States courts. I saw the chairman of the committee privately, and suggested that this was a bad thing to go in that bill. He said that, so far as he was concerned, he was willing for it to go out. I sat here one evening very late anxious to get an opportunity to have the Senate vote it out, but, having assurance that it would go out in conference if the House did not readily agree to it, I left the Chamber. It was ratified by the Senate, and when the conference report on the Five Civilized Tribes bill came back, instead of the provision being out, it was in. I was informed that the House conferees had accepted it without question, and that the Senate conferees were therefore helpless, and could not get it out.

Well, I made a little talk in the Senate in the course of the proceeding called the yeas and nays on the adoption of the conference report on the Five Civilized Tribes bill; but that provision in it was accepted by the Senate and the provision became a law. Later when the Indian appropriation bill, which we now have before it, came into the Senate, finding that it contained a provision amending the bill in relation to the Five Civilized Tribes, which had just passed and which was then not signed by the President, I thought I might still get a chance to get this piece of bad legislation eliminated, and proposed an amendment repealing this provision of the Five Civilized Tribes bill. The conferees on the part of the Senate agreed to let it go in, and assured me that they would try to hold it in.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. This matter having been thoroughly discussed once in the Senate, I do not care to discuss it again, nor do I care to let a statement pass unchallenged which is not according to my understanding of the facts. In reference to this amendment going into the Indian appropriation bill, the Senator from South Carolina asked me if I would see that it was retained. I very frankly told him that he had charged me with bad faith in a case where a Senate amendment had been accepted by the House conferees and the Senate conferees were powerless, and that that was the last promise he would get from me. Whatever I did—and I worked hard to get this in—I did because the Senate had passed the amendment, and not because of any understanding with the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I spoke with the other two conferees. I had very little chat with the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator did not say that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was speaking of the conferees who really had the power. The other two would, of course, outvote the Senator from Minnesota, and they had the controlling hand. I furnished one of them with documents, which were sent to me from the Interior Department, in relation to this claim, which showed its bad character, its outrageous character, and I felt every assurance that the Senate amendment, which I had introduced, which provided for the repeal of this provision in the Five Civilized Tribes bill, being a Senate amendment, and therefore giving the Senate conferees power to insist on it and giving them some leverage on the House conferees, would stay in. But the conference report comes back and this obnoxious provision is left in the law passed to dispose of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, and when this conference report is adopted, if it shall be adopted with that provision in it, this outrage, as I have called it, and I think so still, will be the law.

Why do I call it an outrage? For this simple reason: The litigation which was instituted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the instructions and authority of the Secretary of the Interior is now pending. The lawsuits were begun by the Government to protect the rights and to recover the property or the money due the minors among the Seminoles, for whom Brown had acted as administrator de bonis non. This provision simply ratifying Brown's acts and validating them, puts it out of the power of these little Indian children or orphans to ever recover what is due them, because who can imagine two or three ignorant Indian minors being able to institute a suit or employ any lawyer to go into court to protect their rights and recover the money which Brown misappropriated?

I will read what the Secretary of the Interior in his report, which Senators will find on page 8419 of last Saturday's RECORD, says about this matter. I will just read his conclusions:

> The Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommends, for reasons stated by him, that said amendment should not be enacted into law.
> I fully concur with the Commissioner in his recommendation.

In other words, he wants these lawsuits to be carried to their conclusion and let the man Brown, who is wealthy and powerful, go into court and get such protection as the law will give him—no more and no less. But the proposal here is to validate his acts, to stop the lawsuits, and to turn these orphans loose with no chance for a recovery of their property, unless by some strange and unlikely piece of good fortune some good Samaritan of a lawyer will come along and undertake to conduct their lawsuits for them. I read further down from the report of the Commissioner:

> Special Agent Jenkins paid Andrew Jackson Brown, as administrator of the estates of deceased Seminoles, $151,299.60, of which amount he paid to the Wewoka Trading Company, Samuel J. Crawford, and for cost of administration $103,183.70, which is about 69 per cent of the amount paid him by the special agent.

The Indian Office, after sending an inspector to examine into this matter, reported—> that the payment to Mr. Crawford seemed to have been made without authority of law; that in most of the cases payments were made without the consent of the persons from whose estates the deductions were made, and that proper action should be taken to recover the amount so paid Mr. Crawford.

Further on I read a statement from Mr. Crawford himself, who appears to have been in Washington, and doubtless has appeared before the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is dated Washington, May 14, Ebbitt House, and in it he says:

> Would it not be more honorable for the Government to pay this balance—

A balance of $252,000, which he says is due the Seminoles—> rather than try to compel the administrator to again pay that which he has already paid? This, it seems to me, would be better for the Indians than if the Government should adopt a course calculated to impress upon their minds the fact that they are under no moral obligations to pay their honest debts.

Mr. Crawford is very kind in advising Congress to let this matter rest, after having secured this special piece of legislation validating the payment to himself and validating the action of Jenkins and Brown in disbursing the $186,000.

I read further on in a memorandum submitted by the chairman of the committee a statement by Messrs. Butler and Vale, who have doubtless been employed as attorneys of Mr. Brown—

> It is now conceded that the appointment of Brown as administrator was without authority of law and improvidently made, and that the money of minors was paid over to him by Jenkins without legal authority.

And yet when the Government of the United States, which is in effect the guardian of these Indian orphans, begins lawsuits to determine whether what has been done is wrongful or illegal, the Senate is asked—and the Senate has granted the request—to put into this bill a provision that all the acts, whether lawful or unlawful, whether wrong or right, are ratified and confirmed, and therefore the lawsuits will be stopped and the action of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the Secretary of the Interior will be ignored and in a manner a reprimand will be administered to those officers for attempting to discharge their duties.

I do not know that I care to say anything more, Mr. President. It seems to me very clear that in dealing with the money of Indians nothing can ever be done here without some lawyer appearing on the scene and acting as their agent and going before some committee and getting the indorsement of that committee for legislation which will in the end enable the lawyer to get a very large percentage of the money.

In the Colville Reservation matter, which we had up Saturday, we find that these very same attorneys, Butler and Vale, have been before the committee; that they secured the insertion of a provision which looks to recognizing the debt of the Government—a million and a half dollars—and appropriating at this time a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which went into the bill as passed by the Senate. But the conference have reported back a provision which strikes that out and refers the claim of the attorneys—who have some claim; I do not know what sort of one, whether honest or dishonest, just or unjust—to the Court of Claims for adjudication and report, and I suppose that in due time we will have some other lawyer employed to collect the remainder of the money and get the Treasury to pay it. So this will go on. While we have money here belonging to the Indians, recognized as belonging to them, appropriated by Congress, it can not be collected and paid to them until some lawyer comes here and goes before a committee and gets a provision in some bill authorizing its payment and, of course, gets a good fat fee for it.

I shall ask the Senate at the proper time to disagree to the report, and send it back with instructions to strike out this provision.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. I desire to discuss the question which the Senator from South Carolina has just discussed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I will proceed now on this proposition.

It will clarify things somewhat, I think, Mr. President, to have the facts come before the Senate, and one of the most important points in this discussion is that these Indians have not been Indians within the meaning of the law for a large number of years. They are citizens, and were citizens before this appropriation was made, and the attorney who appeared for them appeared for them not as members of a tribe, not as Indians within the meaning of the law, but as citizens of the United States. He made a contract with them through a committee appointed by those claimants, specifying the percentage he should receive. This is not the statement that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] made. He understands that they are Indians, because he says they are under the guardianship of the United States. That is a mistake. They are not under the guardianship of the United States any more than any other citizens of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was speaking broadly and of the actual condition rather than of the technical, legal situation, and realizing, as the Senator himself must, that the bill which was passed a little while ago, a month ago, for the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes took charge of their entire property, handled it, distributed it, worked it in any shape we saw fit, made allotments, and provided everything connected with it, the Seminoles being among those Indians, I do not see how the idea of guardianship can be got away from. We are in actuality and in honesty their guardians, whether we are legally or not.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from South Carolina is not accurate in the last statement any more than he was in the first. We did not attempt to touch or interfere with the personal property of these Indians in the bill to which the Senator refers. The Government did claim, under a decision of the Supreme Court, that although they had become citizens, the Government, having exercised rights over their real estate, might still continue to do so. But there has been no claim at any time that the Government had any control over the personal property of these Indians.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. When the money was appropriated for these loyal Seminoles, a hundred and eighty-six thousand dollars, through what instrumentality and at whose initiative was Brown appointed administrator?

Mr. TELLER. That I can not answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand, there were families of deceased Indians who had rights to a part of the money appropriated, and the Indian agent, Jenkins——

Mr. TELLER. He was not the Indian agent; he was a special agent.

Mr. TILLMAN. A special agent; anyhow, he had to do with Indian affairs. Jenkins was paid the money by the Government here and authorized and required to disburse it according to law, of course. He goes to the Indian Territory; I do not know how it happened; I have no facts; I can only guess; but he and Brown being friendly, Brown somehow or other got the administratorship. He did not get it legally, because Mr. Butler says it was not lawful. But still Mr. Jenkins paid to an illegally appointed administrator the money intrusted to him by the Government to pay to these Indians. What I am contending against here is that instead of letting the courts—for which the Senator has so much respect and which we all ought to respect—instead of letting the law settle it and let the rights of Brown and everybody else concerned be passed upon by the courts, we step forward and take the responsibility upon ourselves in the Senate to say "We know Brown is an honest man; we know that Brown has not stolen a dollar; therefore we ratify his acts and Jenkins's acts." I want the courts to determine whether or not Brown has stolen any money.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will let me go on and make this speech, and not make it himself, I will give him the facts and not guesses, as he has given. I do not intend to do any guesswork here.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am guessing from the official record.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think I need to say that I have as much interest in the proper discharge of the duties of this Government as has the Senator from South Carolina, and I do not think it would be boasting if I should say that I know a good deal more about the facts in this case than does the Senator from South Carolina. I will show a case before I get through in which, if the Senator has any desire to protect the Indians, he will find a wide field for his sympathy and operations.

I want to go back to the beginning. During the war the Seminole Indians divided into two parts. A part of them were in sympathy with the Confederacy and a part in sympathy with the Government of the United States. Quite a large number of them entered the service of the Government; some of them went the other way. The property of those who remained at home—I am speaking about those who were loyal to the Government—and the property of those who went into the Army was destroyed and appropriated by the Confederate forces, composed in part of Seminole Indians who were disloyal to the Government.

At the close of the war the Government of the United States made a treaty with them and recognized their services. I will not say whether there was one regiment or two, for I have forgotten, but there was at least one regiment in the public service. Before I state the proposition that I started on, I desire to say that the regiment was commanded by Samuel Crawford, who was a colonel, and I believe afterwards a brigadier-general; but at that time he was a colonel. These Seminoles were members of his regiment. At the close of the war Mr. Crawford became governor of Kansas. He was governor for four years. While I was engaged as Secretary of the Interior I made, I think for the first time, the acquaintance of Governor Crawford, who had more or less matters pertaining to Kansas interests and some pertaining to Indian affairs before the Department. I have known him since, and that is in the neighborhood now of twenty-five years. I have always known him as a man of character and good standing. I know that has been his reputation in the community in which he lives.

In the early part of the session Governor Crawford came to me with the suggestion that Mr. Jenkins, who had been appointed by the Government to pay out this money, had paid over a portion of it to a man whom it was afterwards found was not legally entitled to receive it from the Government, and Mr. Jenkins could not get an acquittance from the Government if the Government was disposed to say it was paid to an improper person; that under a condition which did not in the slightest degree reflect upon the integrity of Mr. Brown, he had paid out the money to parties who were entitled to it, under a mistake of law, supposing that he had been properly appointed an administrator for these people.

There are not many Senators present, Mr. President, but I should like to have the attention of those who are here.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think it is of importance that there should be a quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is not one in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of no quorum having been made, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Beveridge	Burnham	Clay
Ankeny	Blackburn	Carter	Crane
Bacon	Bulkeley	Clapp	Cullom
Bailey	Burkett	Clarke, Ark.	Daniel

Dillingham	Hopkins	Millard	Scott
Dolliver	Kittredge	Morgan	Simmons
Dryden	Knox	Nelson	Spooner
Dubois	La Follette	Nixon	Sutherland
Flint	Lodge	Overman	Teller
Frazier	Long	Patterson	Tillman
Gallinger	McEnery	Perkins	Warner
Hale	Mallory	Pettus	Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TELLER. I was saying, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, that Mr. Brown paid out this money as administrator and was afterwards held not to be legally appointed, and the proceedings were irregular, owing to the fact that it was supposed at that time that the laws of Arkansas were in force in the Seminole country, when, in fact, they were not, and were not put in force there for some years afterwards.

A large number of Senators have come in since I commenced talking, and I fear before I reach that point in my remarks they may leave. So I desire to say again that one of the prominent features of this case, which must be kept in mind, is that these people are citizens of the United States, and were citizens of the United States when they made their contract with their attorney; and when I have detailed the history of this case as I understand it, there will be nobody in this Chamber, or outside of it either, who will not say that they were entitled to employ attorneys, and that no discredit can come to the attorney who took their case, but some discredit may come to the Government of the United States that it created the necessity for attorneys in this case.

I will now refer to the administrator's acts. He became administrator supposing the Arkansas law was in effect in that section of the Indian Territory when it was not. Every proceeding under the law was correct, except that the court in one instance made an order in chambers which ought to have been made in court; and subsequently, when Mr. Brown presented his report for approval, it was examined and approved by the judge in chambers when it is now said he should have approved it in open court. That was a proceeding the like of which exists practically everywhere. I will venture to say that in 90 per cent of the cases where the courts pass upon accounts of this kind, while the order may be made in open court, the examination is usually made in chambers, because there it can be done with much better ease and with much greater safety than from the bench. Mr. Brown reported to the court. The court accepted his proceedings as correct, and approved them.

I think I will go back and commence from the beginning again, not repeating what I have said except so far as may be necessary to make it consecutive with what I desire to say now.

At the conclusion of the war, in 1866, the Seminole Indians, who had been loyal to the Government, set up the claim that they had suffered by reason of their loyalty, and they desired the Government to make them some compensation for the property they had lost and for the injuries they had suffered because of their loyalty. The Government made a treaty with them, which I have before me, in which the Government recognized the fact that they were loyal—they could not ignore if they would—and provided in that treaty that a commission should be appointed to determine what the Indians had suffered, what was the value of the property they had lost, and in what cases they were entitled to compensation for property so lost. That was some time in 1866.

Some time in 1867—if anybody is particular about the dates I can give them exactly—this Commission was appointed, as provided by the treaty. They made the examination. The Government advanced $50,000 before this examination was made. The Commission reported that there was due, over and above what had been paid, subtracting the $50,000, $163,000 in round numbers. In section 3 of the act providing for this Commission there was a provision inserted, which any Senator may see, that if there was an amount found due greater than the $50,000 which had been paid, it should draw interest at 5 per cent per annum until it was paid.

Mr. President, that report was made on the 26th day of November, 1867. I hold before me a copy of the report, with the names of all the people who were entitled to receive and the amount which they were entitled to receive. Bear in mind this is not a claim and never has been a claim made by the tribe. It is a claim for losses by individuals. The Commission found how much each individual was entitled to. I listened to a debate here the other day wherein it was said (and it will probably be said again) that where an amount is found against the Government there is no necessity for any attorney to come here to secure the payment of it. There is nobody in this country who is authorized to pay out money, no matter how certain it may be due by the Government of the United States, until the Congress of the United States has made an appropriation for that amount. From the 26th day of November, 1867, until 1902 there was no appropriation of that money made. The Indians appeared here from time to time.

In 1898 we made another treaty with them, or another arrangement, which can also be found in the statutes, by which we agreed that the Senate of the United States should pass upon the question of this unpaid amount, and whatever the Senate did find should belong to them. There was nothing in the world to do but to compute the interest on the balance due—$163,000—in order to find how much was due these Indians.

In the act of 1866 this tribe of Indians ceded to the Government of the United States more than 2,000,000 acres of land, now occupied by white citizens in the Territory of Oklahoma, for the munificent sum of 15 cents an acre, amounting to three hundred and some fifty-odd thousand dollars. I am not going to make any claim that there was anything wrong with this transaction, but it is pretty certain that the Government, then the guardian of these Indians, put a very small price upon the land that the Indians ceded to us, which the Government subsequently sold for a dollar and a quarter an acre, if it sold it at all.

Year after year came these Indians here for their money. But before the act of 1898 they employed Governor Crawford, who had been the colonel of some of them and the colonel of some of the ancestors of these claimants, as is stated, under a written contract. Governor Crawford came here repeatedly. Finally the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs repudiated the claim made by the Indians for $163,000 and 5 per cent on it from that time to the time the matter was before the Senate committee. Thereupon it was said, as a compromise, "We will give you interest on this $163,000 from the time you made the agreement with the Government of the United States," and that gave them about $20,000. That is added to the $163,000, amounting to $23,000, I think, making $186,000.

Now, Mr. President, I stop a moment, and I want some Senator, with the statute lying before him, in which the Government agreed to pay 5 per cent on any amount that should be found above the $50,000, to tell me, subjecting that question to the law of common decency, by what right the Government of the United States had through its committee and through this body and the other to declare that these Indians should take $186,000, leaving unpaid $250,000 due them according to the contract the Government had made with them? And then the Government in that bill required of them that they should accept every dollar that they accepted in full of all that ought to have been paid them.

Mr. President, that is a history which is not respectable. That is a history which no American citizen can be proud of. Whether they were Indians or white men, or Indians who were citizens under the law, they were entitled to the money the Government had agreed to pay them, and which they would not have had to-day if it had not been for the persistent effort of Governor Crawford, coming here year after year, until he finally secured an appropriation for the payment.

You can readily conceive, when I give you these facts, that if Congress, acting through its committee, would pay less than half what was due, it was not likely to pay any of this amount unless some virile force made it necessary that it should be paid.

Mr. President, if any Senator who thinks that attorneys are not needed here when the Indian has a claim against the Government, will take that case and look at the record he will not need to take my statement or anybody else's. It is in black and white. It is on the records that can not be disputed. There is the report of the Commission. There is the contract made in 1866. There is the contract made in 1898. The evidence is abundant of the persistent effort of these people to get the money due them, and which they have received only comparatively recently.

When Congress had made that appropriation the Government sent a man by the name of Jenkins down to pay it out. Mr. Jenkins was not, as supposed, I think, by the Senator from South Carolina, their agent, but a special agent charged with the disbursement of this fund. He went down there, and Mr. Brown was at that time, as I understand he is yet, the treasurer. I suppose the tribe has still a semiofficial relation. He was the treasurer of that organization or tribe. The Government recognized him as the administrator. The Government required him to put up a bond of $300,000 for the proper discharge of his duty as such administrator. He put up that bond, and Mr. Jenkins, supposing him to be administrator de jure, as he was de facto, paid over to him the money that was to be paid to the Indian minors and the heirs, and I suppose in a great measure, undoubtedly as he had to do, turned the matter over to the man who knew the Indians and who has as much character among the Indians as any man there. I have the assurance of the Senator who sits in front of where I speak when here that Mr. Brown is a man of the highest character in the community in which he lives.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. TILLMAN. All that can be brought out in the courts there, where Mr. Brown——

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would wait until I get through. I will touch on the court when I come to it. I know as much about this case as the Senator does, and I would rather make this speech myself.

Mr. President, I want to say here, as a lawyer, that every act Mr. Brown performed in connection with that matter is a legal act. He was the administrator de facto, if he was not de jure. He had given a bond. No man can go into court and say: "I have got $50 from you, but you had no right, as administrator, to take it from Mr. Jenkins, and therefore I will not recognize it as a payment." That is the position not only of the Senator from South Carolina, but I am sorry and ashamed to say that that is the position of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on this proposition.

Governor Crawford came to me and told me the situation. I had never before heard of the matter. He detailed to me the exact conditions, and I introduced at the proper time—not immediately—the amendment. Later, in February, came this letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by which he notified us that suits had been brought. Thereupon the committee added what the Senator from South Carolina ignores, that nothing should prevent suits being brought by any individual who had a legal claim against either Mr. Brown or Mr. Jenkins. The only office, then, of that provision of the law, so far as the United States Government is concerned, was simply to say that Mr. Brown and Mr. Jenkins had discharged their duties properly so far as the General Government was concerned. Ex industria the committee said: "We will not interfere with the suits that have been brought. We will leave that where it is."

Now, Mr. President, the Government has brought no suit. The suits must be brought and can only be brought in the name of the individuals. They are not disturbed in the slightest degree. If Mr. Brown—I hear of no suits against Mr. Jenkins at all—if Mr. Brown can not defend himself and show that he properly paid out the money, then Mr. Brown is a man, I am told, of sufficient wealth to respond, and he has given a bond that is good for $300,000 that the Government holds. There will certainly be an opportunity for these complaining Indians, if complaining they are, to get redress.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina has repeated, whenever he had an opportunity, that we have interfered with the processes of the court. I repeat the Government has no suit pending, and I do not know that the Government ever anticipated bringing suit against Mr. Jenkins or Mr. Brown. I doubt whether, under the conditions existing, they could have maintained a suit even if there had been misappropriation, to the extent that it may be claimed, of the fund. However, that is not a matter now which concerns us. The interference of the committee was for the purpose of protecting Mr. Brown and Mr. Jenkins against any claim that the Government of the United States might have made, and when the amendment was introduced I will venture to say no member of the committee, certainly not the Senator who introduced it, had information that any suit was pending.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I think it will perhaps throw light on the matter to say that he is absolutely correct. The Government is not bringing this suit. The Government is rather supervising the expenditure of the money to the Indians. Some $12,000 being left over, a very industrious attorney down there thought it needed being placed in circulation, and he got the Government in a sort of pro forma manner to stand behind him in bringing two hundred and odd suits. The money, I take it, is rapidly disappearing.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to say a few words about Mr. Brown's payments. It has been the custom in the Indian Territory for years when Indians had a claim against the Government to go to a trader and get credit on the strength of what they would ultimately receive. While I have no doubt that in some instances the Indian has suffered by that system, I know a great many of the traders have suffered worse than the Indians because of the long delay.

Here is a claim adjudicated by the court that we provided, lying here for thirty years, with no effort on the part of the Government to pay it, with a persistent demand by the Indians that it should be paid, and when it finally got before a committee the poor Indian was told that he might take less than one-half or he would get nothing, and then the Government said: "You must release the entire claim or you will get nothing at all."

Mr. Brown, following the practice, paid to those who claimed to have the debt, with the consent of the Indians wherever they were capable of consenting. Where they were minors and could not consent he paid under his bond. I repeat that no act of Congress can deprive any citizen down there of his claim against Mr. Brown if he paid the money to the wrong party. He has his action in that case.

Mr. President, I should have cared but little about this amendment except that I believe Governor Crawford to be a man of high character. I believe he had earned the money, and I know whereof I speak when I say he did not solicit from the Indians this engagement, but they forced it upon him because he had been their colonel and because of his relations to them in the past. The amount paid him is, I understand, in accordance with the contract which he had made not with the tribe of Indians, but with citizens of the United States acting, as all such communities must act, through a committee appointed by them.

Mr. President, there has been no complaint made that I know of by these Indians that they have been swindled. That is the complaint of the man who has brought these suits. I can not say what his fee is to be, but I understand that somebody down there has a fee by which 50 per cent of all that he shall recover from Mr. Brown is to be paid. I have no doubt that that is a fact.

PANAMA CANAL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I inquire if the Senator from Nebraska is ready to address the Senate upon the unfinished business?

Mr. MILLARD. I am not ready this morning to address the Senate, but I expect to do so on Wednesday morning after the morning hour.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, in the light of the statement of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid aside unless objection is made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is laid aside.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 59. An act providing for the establishment of a uniform building line on streets in the District of Columbia less than 90 feet in width;

S. 2270. An act for the relief of Nicola Masino, of the District of Columbia;

S. 4170. An act to amend an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for prior years, and for other purposes;" and

S. 4268. An act changing the name of Douglas street to Clifton street.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 172) to supply a deficiency in an appropriation for the postal service; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORRELL, Mr. GREENE, and Mr. MCLAIN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 17881) permitting the building of a dam across Crow Wing River between the counties of Morrison and Cass, State of Minnesota, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the message just received from the House of Representatives, relative to the school bill, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, schools officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia, and requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. BURKETT, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. GEARIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. TELLER. Now, Mr. President, I wish to add a word or two more. There is nothing in this bill, there is nothing in this proceeding that will prevent the Government from continuing the course that it has adopted of encouraging some man down there to bring these suits. There ought to be something in the bill that would prevent the Government from paying out the money of these Indians that has not yet been paid to this attorney, whoever he may be. If the Government chooses to pay the expenses of this litigation, it can do so, if it has the funds, and I suppose it can pay them out of the funds that belong to the Indians who have not yet been found or who have not claimed it. However, this litigation down there is not in the interest of the Indians, but in the interest of some man who wants to make a fee.

Mr. President, I expressed some feeling on this subject the other night. I have some feeling on it. I am not proud of the statement that I have to make here. Yet, Mr. President, after nearly thirty years of active public service here, I can say that it is but a sample, and not an exaggerated sample either, of our treatment of the Indian tribes of this continent when it comes to paying our just and proper debts.

Mr. President, I think perhaps, on the whole, I had better leave this matter where it is. My experience in the Senate, and in another place in connection with these affairs is—and I will sum it up in a few words—that the Government of the United States never paid an honest debt to an Indian until it was compelled to do it. One of the greatest troubles we have had in securing proper legislation has been that every movement to right the wrong of the Indian has been met on this floor and on the other by those who did not know anything about the subject, and who took charge of it, in spite of the protests of those who knew the facts and who were ready to do justice, so far as they could, to the Government and the Indian alike.

Mr. President, I am glad, in some respects, that we have reached a point in the history of this country when there are no longer any wards for us, or, practically only a few at least, for I am sure if the history of our guardianship shall ever be written in truth, as it is, it will be the blackest and most disgraceful chapter in our whole history as a nation.

When I say that I do not mean to say that we have not dealt with the Indians more liberally than any nation in the world ever dealt with the natives. There is no history where an invading nation like we were, coming into a country occupied by the natives, has ever dealt with them as liberally as we have. We have made the most extraordinary contracts, because there was not proper attention paid to them.

We have recognized titles that did not belong in the Indian, and we have entered into a solemn obligation to pay them for land which in part we ought to have opened and held, and that they did not own. When we found we had made a mistake or when we began to doubt whether it was what we ought to have done, then we have quietly repudiated the obligation, until the Indian has believed for more than two generations that the white man always spoke to him with a forked tongue.

Now, Mr. President, this case is neither infamous nor outrageous. If it is infamous at all, it is in the fact that this debt was not paid. If it is infamous at all, it is infamous because we demanded that they should take a small part of the money when they ought to have had it all. If it is an outrage, Mr. President, it is an outrage because they were compelled to come here and prosecute a case, and hire lawyers to do it. I have always said, and I repeat now, for we shall soon be done with this class of cases, in every instance where a lawyer came here and prosecuted a case before the committees and before the courts, the Government of the United States ought to have been compelled to pay that fee and not the Indian.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. If he desires it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator want to speak on this subject?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to speak on the amendment involving the payment of attorneys' fees which has been discussed in connection with this subject.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to put in the RECORD, at the close of my remarks, Senate Document No. 72, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, leaving out the list of names. I ask permission to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Leave will be granted, if there be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. I do not wish the names, because that is immaterial; I should like to have the amounts put in, but not the names.

The report referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 72, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.]

LOYAL SEMINOLE ROLLS AND LOSSES.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 20, 1899.

SIR: On January 18 the Department received the resolution of the Senate of the United States dated 17th instant, as follows:

"Whereas by article 4 of the treaty of March 21, 1866, with the Seminole Nation of Indians, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to investigate and determine the losses sustained by loyal Seminoles during the war of the rebellion; and

"Whereas by the agreement of December 16, 1897, with said nation it was and is provided as follows: 'The loyal Seminole claim shall be submitted to the United States Senate, which shall make final determination of the same, and, if sustained, shall provide for payment thereof within two years from date thereof:' Therefore

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the roll of said loyal Seminoles, and also a copy of the report of the commissioners appointed by him to investigate and determine said losses, in pursuance of the said treaty of 1866. And be it further

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to investigate the matter, in accordance with said treaty and agreement, and report by bill or otherwise its conclusions to the Senate, with such recommendations as may be deemed advisable."

Said resolution was duly referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for early report in duplicate. In compliance with said resolution, I now have the honor to transmit copies of the loyal Seminole rolls and the report of the commissioners appointed to investigate Seminole losses.

Respectfully,

C. N. BLISS,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

WASHINGTON, November 26, 1867.

SIR: The undersigned, a commission by appointment of the Secretary of the Interior, under the authority of the fourth article of the treaty of the 21st March, 1866, between the United States and the Seminole Indians, "to adjudge and determine the claims of loyal Seminoles for losses actually sustained by reason of their having remained loyal and faithful to their treaty stipulations to the United States during the recent rebellion," etc., respectfully report that having received our instructions, we immediately started for the Seminole country.

By appointment of the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it was arranged that the commission should meet in the city of St. Louis, Mo., on the 14th of August. The undersigned were prompt in their meeting, but failed to meet a third commissioner, of whose appointment we had been duly advised. We waited a reasonable time for his appearance, then telegraphed the Department for instructions, and received an answer authorizing us "to wait one day longer, and if he did not appear, then we should proceed and execute our mission without him." Acting upon our instructions, we promptly left St. Louis and proceeded by the most direct and expeditious route to the field of our labors. After a fatiguing trip, made long by the modes of travel incident to the far West, we reached the Seminole Agency on the night of the 9th of September, and on the morning following we began our duties.

Upon our arrival we found the northern portion of the Seminoles in council, and at once put ourselves in communication with them, making known our business, and thus giving the "public notice" required by the terms of our instructions, which notice was promptly disseminated among the people of the nation by the chief and headmen of the different bands. We also communicated with John Jumper, a chief residing with the southern portion of the Seminoles at the old agency, distant 50 miles, and requested that he would make known our arrival and business among that portion of the Seminole people. In due time we received his acknowledgment, which, with a copy of our letter, is herewith transmitted.

It will be seen by reference to some of the claims that the claimants have put in for loss of guns; also for loss of cash (gold and silver coin). In the instance of a loss of guns, we have, through witnesses, satisfied ourselves that the claimants carried a gun off with them at the time of leaving home, and only allowed for guns when the claimant carried away one or more and had to leave others behind.

In the item of cash, occurring in some of the claims, we have made our investigations as full as possible, always satisfying ourselves through witnesses that the claimant actually possessed said money and lost it on account of the disturbed condition of the country in consequence of the rebellion. In every such case the money was lost at the Budd Creek fight, occurring on the night of the 25th of December, 1861, while the claimant was endeavoring to escape from the rebel forces then overrunning the Seminole country.

These loyal Indians had successfully beaten the rebels in two previous fights, but on the 25th of December they were surprised in camp and many massacred, and lost all their effects. We are of opinion that the claimants are entitled to include said item in their bill of losses, as much so as if the loss had been in cattle, especially so when we consider that their best efforts were exhausted to prevent its loss.

Our investigations were thorough in each case, especially as regarded the amounts and the estimates or prices therefor; we obtained reliable information from disinterested persons of prices ruling the market in the Seminole country at the breaking out of the war, and in our awards governed ourselves accordingly. We are satisfied that the prices allowed the claimants are reasonable and just, certainly not too high.

We held our sessions as a board from day to day, and neither commissioner transacted any business in the absence of the other. We received much valuable assistance in our investigations from the chief, John Chupco, and the headmen of the various bands; also from Robert Johnson, interpreter.

In our expenditures for expenses we were as economical as circumstances would allow, and feel warranted in saying that we incurred no bills, chargeable to the Government, except such as were necessary to the proper discharge of our duties.

During our labors we examined and determined 340 claims, amounting in the aggregate to $213,915.95.

Respectfully submitted.

J. TYLER POWELL,
J. W. CALDWELL,
Commissioners.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment further, I have just received a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in which he says that I am quoted as saying on Saturday that within the last two years we paid attorneys in the Indian Territory $750,000 upon a contract approved by the Department of the Interior, as the law required, and gave them a million and a half dollars, etc.

I think I may have said that, but I was under the impression that that contract was approved. I know Congress appropriated the money. I think, perhaps, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who I see here, would be able to state more about the matter. I gave it no personal attention at the last session. But the Secretary says the Department did not approve the contract. However, the fact remains that it was paid. I think I had better put into the RECORD the letter. It was left to some court down there to determine. They were claiming a million and a half dollars. The court held that they were entitled to $750,000. I ask to add that to what I have said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be printed in the RECORD, if no objection is made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 11, 1906.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to your remarks on Saturday, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 8414, reading as follows:

"Within the last two years we paid attorneys in the Indian Territory $750,000 upon a contract approved by the Department of the Interior, as the law required, which gave them a million and a half dollars, etc."

In reply to which I respectfully ask you to correct this statement, as such contract was never approved, in whole or in part, by the Department of the Interior.

The facts are as follows:

The value of a citizenship in the Choctaw Nation was estimated at $5,000, and it was claimed that some 4,000 Mississippi Choctaws, through certain attorneys, were endeavoring to have their names enrolled for the purpose of sharing this asset, if secured.

Messrs. Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, of South McAlester, claimed that if these 4,000 applicants for citizenship were enrolled it would represent a total of $20,000,000, on a $5,000 citizenship valuation, and the assets available for those Choctaws that were regularly enrolled would be diminished correspondingly. In order to prevent this, they secured the approval of the chiefs of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of a contract on the basis of 9 per cent for preventing the enrollment of these 4,000 Choctaws, which contract, if carried out in its entirety, would have given them a fee of $1,800,000.

As you are aware, section 2103 requires that all contracts with Indians, to be effective, must have the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Such approval, because of its extraordinary terms, was refused by me and, without going into details, the matter was then taken by Messrs. Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish to Congress, which left the matter of compensation to the citizens' court, which was organized to dispose of these Choctaw cases, and the last act of that court was to award to Messrs. Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish the $750,000 fee which you, in an unintentional error, stated was approved by this Department. On the contrary, this Department took every means within its power to prevent the payment of said fee, going so far as to ask the opinion of the Attorney-General, who decided that this Department was powerless, because the matter had been taken out of its hands by Congress.

Respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire briefly to address myself to the amendment made by the conferees to the Senate amendment providing for the payment to certain attorneys of $150,000 for services rendered in connection with the collection from the Government of compensation for certain lands purchased by the Government from the Indians. Before I conclude I wish to call particular attention to what I regard as a very extraordinary proviso at the end of the amendment which the conferees made to the Senate's amendment. Before doing that I shall——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to inquire what amendment the Senator is directing his remarks to?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is amendment numbered 191.

Mr. CLAPP. All right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before doing that, Mr. President, I wish to make some general observations upon the proposition to have this very large sum of money paid these attorneys.

I do not know anything about the facts in this case further than I have been able to gather them in the course of this debate. It may be that these attorneys are entitled to this money, but from the statements that have been made during the course of this debate, in my opinion, if they are entitled to any part of it, and I think probably they are entitled to some part of it, they are not entitled to all of it, nor to any great portion of it. I am utterly unable to see what services have been rendered by these attorneys which constitute legal services, except that in connection with the investigation of the titles to these lands.

As I understand it, the Government desired to purchase from the Indians certain lands. An agreement was entered into for the purchase of those lands. It was discovered that perhaps there was some question as to the title of the Indians to the lands, or at least to a part of them, and it became necessary, as I understand it, to make a legal investigation to ascertain whether the title of the Indians was good and such as gave them the right to convey these lands to the Government. Nobody will question that legal services of this character ought to be paid for, and ought to be paid for liberally, but I take it that nobody will contend that such services as might be required in connection with the looking up of a title, or if it involved a number of titles, to a million and a half acres of land is worth the great sum of $150,000.

The Government itself would not pay any such sum of money as that for such service. No individual or corporation would think of paying any such sum as that. That, I say, is, to my mind, from the statements which have been made in this debate, the only service rendered by these attorneys for which they have in law a claim against these Indians.

I am aware of the fact that it has been the custom of the Government, in allowing attorneys' fees in these controversies growing out of the interest of Indians, to be exceedingly liberal to attorneys. Enormous fees have been paid in this connection—fees large enough, in some instances, to make a man independent for the remainder of his life; but, Mr. President, that is all wrong. These Indians are in the nature of wards of the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether he does not believe that the Court of Claims will take into consideration what services have been legally performed and for what character of services no compensation should be allowed, if there were such services, and also, instead of paying $150,000 to determine what properly would be a fair fee and proper fee for proper legal services?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no doubt in the world that the Court of Claims will take into consideration these questions, but——

Mr. McCUMBER. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the action contemplated is not an action upon a contract, but an action on the quantum merult to determine the value of the services rendered wholly independent of contract?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] does not state the proposition exactly. If it were as he states it, perhaps little or no objection could be made; but it is admitted on every hand that as to any contracts entered into in 1903 or 1904, or somewhere along there, such contracts at that time became as though they had no recognition; and certainly all that ought to be recovered under those circumstances would be the quantum meruit. When the committee in the amendment propose to refer this matter to the Court of Claims they do it with this direction:

> And in determining the amount of compensation for such services the court may consider all contracts or agreements heretofore entered into by said Indians with attorneys who have represented them in the prosecution of said claim, and also all services rendered by said attorneys for said Indians in the matter of said claim.

It comes pretty nearly to a direction to the court to let them have what Congress in this amendment will set aside—$150,000. It is not a command; it is not a direction to give them a certain $150,000, but it directs the court to take into consideration the contract that will give them $150,000 for services rendered on that contract, that contract now being a new and absolutely void contract. It is that element of this amendment which ought not to be in it. To my mind, it is very clearly intended that the Court of Claims shall be moved or directed in their investigation and final determination of this matter by the terms of the contract itself.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Colorado will recall that there is no direction, no command, merely an authority given, as I understand it, that the court may take into consideration, if they see fit, the matter of any contracts heretofore made between the attorneys and the tribes for the purpose only of determining what are the usual or proper charges for work of that character in that section of the country; and obviously that is the only way they can get at it.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is precisely the necessary result of that interpretation. I think the Senator properly states the question. It directs the Court of Claims to take into consideration testimony which, without this direction, it probably would not take into consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not a direction, as I understand.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, no; but——

Mr. McCUMBER. It simply provides——

Mr. PATTERSON. It will be recognized as a command from Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know we are taking the time of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]——

Mr. PATTERSON. That is true, but the Senator from North Carolina does not object to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am very good natured and very patient.

Mr. PATTERSON. If these attorneys are to be paid for the value of services for which they had no contract, no court should be directed to take into consideration documents which could not properly otherwise be considered under the rules of evidence, and which they would not otherwise be permitted to take into consideration. Congress setting apart $150,000 and directing or suggesting that the court shall consider the contract which gives $150,000 is equivalent to saying that, in the judgment of Congress, the court ought to give that amount.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say that in the amendment Congress does not set aside $150,000. That part is stricken out of the amendment, and it will become no part of the proposed new law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] has anticipated me. I was going to say that I thought it was entirely proper, and, so far as I was concerned, I had no objection to the Court of Claims passing upon this question and allowing these attorneys such sums of money as it might find were due them upon a quantum meruit; but, Mr. President, if that were the sole purpose of the conferees when they injected this amendment into this bill, as the Senator from Colorado says, why did they incorporate in that amendment what is tantamount to a direction to the Court of Claims to take into consideration the contracts which were made with those attorneys and which had in law expired and become of no effect four years ago? It is manifest, Mr. President, that this amendment is so drawn as to carry the question before the Court of Claims with an intimation, or what is in the nature of an intimation, on the part of Congress that these attorneys are to be paid under a contract which has become void and of no effect. I can not see any other purpose in embodying in this amendment the specific reference to which I have referred and to which the Senator from Colorado has referred, unless it was expected to have that effect.

But, Mr. President, as I was proceeding to say, the Government has been exceedingly liberal with attorneys of Indians when paying out money which belongs to the Indians. It has repeatedly paid fees which, compared with the ordinary compensation of attorneys in this country, were fabulous. In some instances they have paid fees which have made men rich. I think it was the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on Saturday, in discussing this amendment, who referred to one case in which Congress had indirectly, if not directly, given its assent to the payment to certain attorneys of the sum of $750,000 out of a total fund of about a million and a half dollars due the Indians, or 50 per cent of the whole.

The Indians are the wards of the Government; they are, in a sense, children; they are under disability; they can not act for themselves; we have to act for them. That being the case, Mr. President, when the Government is providing for fees or the expenditure for any other purpose of Indian funds it ought to hold itself to the same degree of responsibility that a court of chancery holds a guardian in dealing with the funds of his ward. If we were to apply that test in this case, in my judgment, disallowing that part of the fees here claimed which are immoral and illegal, and as being contrary to public policy, this fee, instead of being $150,000, would not be one-tenth of that great sum.

Mr. President, I do not question for a minute that it is perfectly legitimate and proper that an attorney may, in certain cases and for certain purposes, appear before the Departments here at Washington and appear before the committees of Congress. If there is a question of fact involved in any controversy before the Department in which the Government is interested, or in which these Indians, the wards of the Government, are interested, I can see no reason why it should not be represented before the Departments for the purpose of presenting to the Department or to the committees of Congress for the purpose of presenting to that committee those facts or the evidence of those facts. So, Mr. President, if there is involved before a Department or before a committee of Congress a controverted question of law, I can see no reason why it is not legitimate and proper that counsel should appear, and there present an argument, throwing light, or tending to throw light, upon those difficult and complex questions of law.

But, Mr. President, the testimony in this case shows to my mind clearly that there is not in this particular instance a single controverted fact outside of the investigation of the title to these lands, to which I referred, nor a single question of law to be settled and determined by the Department or by a committee of Congress.

The Government had made a contract. That contract definitely and specifically fixed the price to be paid for the land. That contract specified the location of the land, specified the number of acres that were to be required and the price to be paid per acre. There was no controversy either before the Department of the Interior or before the committees of Congress as to the contract, as to the price to be paid, or as to the property stipulated to be bought; the only question of fact or law in this whole matter was as to the title of the land which the Government had contracted to buy.

I say it is perfectly legitimate to pay these attorneys for the investigation of that title, but I say that $150,000 to investigate the title to a million and a half acres of land, or one hundred titles that might be involved in the whole tract, would be an enormous sum and out of all proportion to the services rendered.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to state to the Senator from North Carolina that there was in reality no question of title at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has been stated that there was. I do not know anything about it, except from the statements made.

Mr. PATTERSON. The facts, as gleaned from the letter of the Interior Department to the committee of the House, are that there was no title in question at all. The President by Executive order set apart a certain area of land in Washington for the Colville Indians.

Within a short time it was discovered that the area set apart embraced five or six hundred whites, two or three small villages, and a jail and a few other public improvements. Thereupon a new Executive order was made that gave to these Colville Indians a smaller area of land. Then a commission was appointed to negotiate a treaty for the surrender of the possession of one-half of the last area that had been set apart. The contract was negotiated, and a million and a half dollars were to be paid. The Secretary of the Interior communicated that treaty or agreement to Congress and asked for the appropriation. Congress deliberately determined that the Indians had no title that the Government was bound to regard. It was simply a title of possession, and, because Congress concluded at that time, in 1902, that the title of the Indians was not such that the Government was bound to pay attention to it, Congress did not ratify that contract, but proceeded to legislate with reference to the land that it had secured by the treaty, opening it up to settlement, setting apart certain portions of it for the Indians, and doing various other things with it. The only controversy that has existed from that time to this has been as to whether or not the title, such as it was—that is, a mere possession or taking possession of this great area of land by the Indians under Executive order—constituted a title that the Government or Congress ought to respect. There has never been any investigation of the title. It has been simply a contest on the one side that the title was such that Congress ought to regard it, and up to the present time Congress declaring that it was a title that the Government was not bound to observe. Ultimately a settlement was made recognizing the validity of the contract, but there has never been an abstract of title or a record examined or one item of work done by an attorney in the matter of determining whether or not these Indians had any title, legal or equitable, beyond the facts I have stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, as I understand the Senator, there has been no investigation of the title to these lands?

Mr. PATTERSON. None whatever.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Government has taken its chances as to the soundness or unsoundness of the title. If that be true, Mr. President, then, in my judgment, there have been no services, so far as the debate discloses and so far as the facts have been presented, performed by these attorneys that constitute legal services for which they ought to be paid. If they have performed no service in the investigation of the title, if there have been no controverted facts that had to be presented to the Department and the committee, if there have been no questions of law that had to be argued before the Department or before the committee, then the sole consideration for this demand upon the Government to put its hands into the funds of its wards is based upon the contention that these eminent counsel have been able to exert sufficient influence upon the Department and upon the Houses of Congress to secure the passage of an act of Congress referring their claim for fees to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to state one other fact. The Department has always been with the Indians; the Department has always wanted Congress to make this appropriation, and all that remained to be done was to induce Congress to make it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That simply lessens the services which these gentlemen performed, and reduces it to a proposition of these gentlemen to have the Congress send to the Court of Claims a claim based upon no other consideration than that they have been able to persuade the committees of this Congress to provide through legislation for the payment of this bogus claim.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Such considerations as those, under the Supreme Court decisions, are void in law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to discuss that. Mr. President, while I have frankly admitted that there are circumstances under which it is proper for attorneys to appear before committees of Congress and to be paid for their appearance, yet if that appearance is simply for the purpose of exerting influence to bring about legislation——

Mr. OVERMAN. For a contingent fee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or if it is for a contingent fee, then that contract, based upon payment for services of that kind, is according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, read in this body by my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] on Saturday, and according to the uniform decisions of the courts of this country, an immoral contract and void, as being against public policy, and it ought to be.

If it be proper to refer this case to the Court of Claims—and I do not know enough about the facts to venture a positive opinion that it is not proper to do it—it is also proper, Mr. President, that this discussion should take place here; and if Congress has not heretofore let it be understood that it placed the seal of its condemnation upon the appearance of attorneys before the committees of this body simply for the purpose of lobbying, it is time that we should not only give the courts to understand, but it is time that we should let the district attorneys of the United States, who represent the Government in cases of this kind, understand that they are to put that defense before the court and insist upon it.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on Saturday, in answer to the decision cited by my colleague, referred to a case in his own State in which an attorney had been allowed by the court a large sum of money for appearing before the Departments here and before the committees of Congress. I think he said that the court allowed it. The Senator did not state what court; I do not know whether that case went to a court of last resort. If it were merely the adjudication of some court of first instance, it goes for naught. If it were the adjudication of the highest court in this land—the Supreme Court—it goes for naught, unless the specific question of the immorality as against public policy of the contract was set up by the attorney as a defense.

We all know that ordinarily a court can not take cognizance of anything except what appears of record. Every lawyer knows that ordinarily a court can not pass upon any defense which is not raised by the pleadings. It is true that if enough appears from the record to show that the court has not jurisdiction or power to try the question, then the court must of its own motion take cognizance of that fact; but a decision of the Supreme Court sustaining a contract for services to appear before a committee of Congress would not in itself settle that question, unless it appeared affirmatively that in the pleadings made up in the court of first instance that specific defense was set forth. Therefore, Mr. President, I say it is of the highest importance here that this discussion should take place, and that the Senate should give an expression of opinion which the district attorney who will be in charge of this matter on behalf of the Indians in the Court of Claims will have to recognize, to the end that he may in that court present the defense that this contract was based upon an immoral and illegal consideration and, therefore that the contract was void as against public policy.

It was said, I believe, both by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that the contention that this was an illegal contract had no force because it was claimed that there are statutes of the United States which recognize the right of the Indians to employ counsel.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. In order that the record may be complete upon this question of the controversy over title, I want to read a short extract from a letter written by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior in relation to this $1,500,000 under the contract to show that there were no services to be rendered in the Department because the Department had always held that it was a valid contract, that there was no controversy over the title, and that it was simply a matter of duty on the part of Congress to make the appropriation. This is the closing paragraph of that letter.

> In all of the reports made by this Office in regard to the rights of the Indians to that part of the reservation ceded to the United States in the agreement dated May 9, 1901, it has expressed the opinion that the Indians had a good and valid title to the land in question.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator read "May 9, 1901." Did the Senator read it correctly?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, May 9, 1901. That is the date of the agreement, I think.

Mr. DUBOIS. It should be 1891.

Mr. McCUMBER. 1891 is the date of the agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Colorado object to putting that matter in after I have finished?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is only three or four lines.

In all of the reports made by this Office in regard to the rights of the Indians to that part of the reservation ceded to the United States in the agreement dated May 9, 1901—

It ought to be 1891—

it has expressed the opinion that the Indians had a good and valid title to the land in question, and that they ought to be paid the amount stated in the agreement made with them by the commission appointed for that purpose.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. This treaty, if you will excuse me for just a little explanation——

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. DUBOIS. Was made in 1891 by a commission, at the head of which was Judge Fullerton, the Government agreeing to pay the Indians a million and a half dollars for a million and a half acres, and there were some other considerations in the treaty. Congress, in 1892, ratified the agreement, except to pay the Indians this money, and the committee of the Senate then made a report that these lands did not belong to the Indians; that they were created by an Executive order, and the Indians had not any title to the land. That report of the Senate committee, made by General Manderson, has stood as a bar against that payment up to and including the present time. The attorneys have been contending against the report of the Senate committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Idaho is not altogether correct in his facts. This is also an extract from the letter from which I have been reading:

This agreement was, by letter of January 6, 1892, with a draft of a bill prepared by this Office, transmitted by the President to Congress for its action. The correspondence relative to this matter up to the submission of the agreement to Congress is printed in Executive Document No. 15, Fifty-second Congress, first session.

The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs refused to recommend the ratification of the agreement, taking the ground that the Indians had no title to the reservation set apart for them by the Executive order of July 2, 1872, which the Government was bound to recognize and which would, in effect, be recognized by the ratification of the agreement. (See Senate Report No. 664, 52d Cong., 1st sess.)

In lieu of ratifying the agreement a bill was reported by the Senate committee vacating the north one-half of the reservation (the part proposed to be ceded by the agreement), which bill became a law July 1, 1892, without the President's approval. (27 Stat. L., 62.)

Mr. DUBOIS. That is precisely what I tried to say.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator said Congress ratified it, but did not pay the money. It distinctly refused to ratify it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Congress took their lands. It ratified the treaty to that extent. It took this land away from the Indians, but refused to appropriate the money, on the ground that the Indians had no title to the land. As a matter of fact, the Government did take their lands, opened to settlement, and sold the land for a dollar and a quarter an acre——

Mr. PATTERSON. A dollar and a half an acre.

Mr. DUBOIS. Until the free-homes bill was passed. Then they let other settlers take the land for nothing. Those are the facts, and the necessity for the employment of attorneys is obvious. They were employed, and they have been employed ever since.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that even the Senator from Idaho contends that these attorneys made any investigation of the titles or furnished the Government with any chain or abstract of title.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that they did. Evidently this debate will continue for a half hour or so, and I will have all of that evidence here. I did not suppose it would be necessary. I presumed the Senate would take the word of the committee, who have gone into it carefully and before whom all this evidence has been exhibited, showing the services of the attorneys for all these years. But it will be here in a few moments, and I will submit it to the Senator or to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated in the beginning of my remarks with entire frankness that my understanding from the statements made on this floor on Saturday, was that there had been some service rendered the Government by these attorneys in the way of investigating titles to this land, and that I thought they ought to be paid for making those investigations a reasonable and a fair price. The question whether there was any such investigation was raised by the Senator from Colorado, who stated that his information was to the effect that no such investigation had been made, and that no abstract of title had ever been furnished to the Government; and I said if that was true there was no consideration which the law recognizes as a legal and valid consideration for the payment of this large sum of money which it is proposed to have the Court of Claims pass upon, or even for the reference of this matter to the Court of Claims. But if there were services of the character indicated by the Senator from Idaho, they were legitimate services and they ought to be paid for, and I would have no objection whatever to the reference of this matter to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining what was the reasonable value of that service, and I would be glad to have the gentlemen get it.

But, Mr. President, that is a diversion. I had passed that part of my argument. I was replying to the contention made here on Saturday that Congress had directly recognized this class of contracts, and that the legislation which had taken place upon the subject of paying attorneys for appearing before Congress and the Departments in behalf of the Indians was to be taken as the sanction of Congress to the validity and binding effect of such contracts.

I have not read all of the statutes. I have, however, examined the statute read by the Senator from Colorado to sustain that contention, and, in my judgment, it has nothing to do with the question which we are now discussing. That statute simply clothes the Indians with the power, under certain circumstances and conditions and with certain safeguards, to contract for the sale of their lands and for the payment of attorneys. Without that statute these Indians were under a disability. They had no power to contract, such as I have and such as the ordinary American citizen has. The only office of this statute was to confer upon the Indians, within the limitations and circumstances specified in that statute, the same contractual powers than an ordinary citizen possesses. An ordinary citizen, while possessing the power to contract, has no right to make an illegal contract; and when the laws of Congress confer upon the Indian the power of contract that I possess as a free citizen, it does not confer upon him any right to make an illegal contract.

That is the contention which I am pressing now—that as there were no facts to be established by testimony before the Department or the committees of Congress, as there were no controverted questions of law to be argued before the Department or before the committees of Congress, the only possible consideration for these services, outside of the investigation of title, was the services performed by these attorneys in the way of persuading the committees, or, to be blunt and short about it, the only service to be performed was the service of a lobbyist, and it is against the public policy of this country, and it ought to be against the public policy of this country, and every other country, to prevent recovery for services of that character.

Mr. President, I stated in the outset that before I concluded I wanted to call attention to what I regard as an extraordinary proviso in this amendment, made by the conferees to the Senate amendment, for that is what it is. It is this: After providing for sending this case to the Court of Claims, and after specifying that the Court of Claims shall take into consideration a contract for fees which it is admitted has expired and become void, and the payment of the whole sum collected to Butler & Vale, they insert this proviso:

Provided, That before any money is paid to any attorney having an agreement with Butler & Vale as to the distribution of said fees each of the same shall execute and deliver to the Secretary of the Interior a satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands for services rendered said Indians in the matter of their said claim.

Now, immediately before that proviso is a provision authorizing the payment to Butler & Vale of the whole sum that may be found by the Court of Claims to be due all these attorneys—that which is due other attorneys, as well as that which is due them as attorneys. They are made the receivers of the full amount embraced in the judgment of the Court of Claims, and then comes a proviso which recognizes the fact that the Government might be under legal obligations to other attorneys than Butler & Vale, and unless it secured a discharge and acquittance from those other attorneys, it might be subject to an additional claim and a future suit; and it provides that after Butler & Vale have received the money, they shall not pay it out until these other attorneys present a receipt in favor of the Government. In other words, if I can construe the English language, the effect of this provision is to make Mr. Butler and Mr. Vale disbursing officers of the Government, as to the amount of this fund found due attorneys other than themselves.

If the Government has a liability in this matter to these other attorneys that it is proper it should protect itself against by requiring receipts, why not require those receipts to be made to the Treasury Department and the money paid out by the Treasury Department? Is it not an unheard-of thing that the Government should turn over its funds, recognizing in the law that it needs a receipt and has not a receipt, and then say that the parties to whom it shall turn over that money shall not pay it out until a receipt is presented to the Government? I think myself it is a very extraordinary proceeding, and I do not understand why the committee should have inserted such a proviso in this bill.

Mr. President, for a long time it has seemed to me that the Government in paying out the funds of Indians did not exercise that care and that prudence and that economy which common justice and ordinary fairness in dealings between man and man required, to say nothing about the higher duties which the Government placed in the position of guardian, as it is, owes to its ward. I had made up my mind at the first opportunity to express myself against this practice of the Government in paying out Indian funds without regard to the interest of the ward and with such lavish liberality and extravagance. This is the first opportunity I have had, and I have gladly availed myself of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, a few words only on the amendment to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] addressed his remarks. In this bill, as it was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, was found this item:

> The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James D. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed: Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

I do not intend to criticise the conferees. The management of the bill has been one, I concede, involving a great deal of trouble and a great deal of labor, and I in no way would impeach the good faith of any of the conferees. I am told and the Senate has been told that this provision was insisted upon by the conferees on the part of the House, and it being a Senate amendment, they were helpless to prevent its incorporation in the bill as reported by the conferees.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior both protested against the incorporation in this bill of that amendment, their objection, as I understand, going, as mine does, only to a portion of it. I think it is a vicious piece of legislation, and absolutely indefensible. I listened to the Senator from Colorado with great interest, but he did not address himself to the grounds upon which this portion of the provision, it seems to me, to be without the slightest foundation in reason. I do not defend the Government against the charge which he brings against it of having been an unfaithful, unwise, and indifferent guardian of the Indian, using the word in a generic sense. No one can successfully controvert, in my opinion, his proposition. But, Mr. President, the guardianship of the Government, inefficient, unjust, dilatory as it was, was infinitely better and kindlier to the Indians than the policy adopted by the Congress under which by an act of legislation the Indian became a citizen, removed from the guardianship of the Government, and subject, without limit, to spoliation by the white man; and that in substance is his present condition.

Mr. President, these Indians ought to have been paid long ago. The Senator from Colorado is right about that. They broke away from their band and adhered to the cause of the Union during the war; very many of them entered the Army of the United States, and naturally they paid the penalty in the destruction of their crops, the loss of their cattle, and the destruction, in many instances, of their homes. They had no legal claim against the Government, but it was an unique and exceptional case under the circumstances, and if any government ever owed a debt of honor, this Government owed it to the loyal Seminoles to ascertain as speedily as possible their loss and to secure to them prompt reparation. And there is no reason or justification to be given for withholding it for many years, and for the necessity being put upon the Indians to employ lawyers to jog the Government, to prick the conscience of Congress, and to secure the ascertainment and ultimately the payment of the money with interest.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will pardon me. I am in a hurry to get through.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just thinking that the Senators who will come from the cloak rooms and the committee rooms presently to vote upon this question——

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator not to make any suggestion of that kind.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am interested in this matter; I started this racket; and I want Senators to vote intelligently. I suggest, Mr. President, there is no quorum in the Chamber.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator can not compel anybody to vote intelligently.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can at least have them responsible if they vote wrongly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has once performed this operation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Culberson	Hansbrough	Pettus
Ankeny	Cullom	Hemenway	Piles
Bacon	Daniel	Kean	Rayner
Bailey	Dillingham	Kittredge	Scott
Beveridge	Dolliver	Knox	Spooner
Blackburn	Dryden	La Follette	Stone
Brandegee	Dubois	Long	Sutherland
Bulkeley	Flint	McCumber	Taliaferro
Burkett	Foraker	Mallory	Teller
Burnham	Frazier	Money	Tillman
Burrows	Fulton	Morgan	Warner
Clapp	Gallinger	Overman	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Gearin	Patterson	Wetmore
Clay	Hale	Perkins	Whyte

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. SPOONER. I shall take but a short time.

The Government at last appropriated $186,000 to be paid to the loyal Seminole Indians, and appointed J. D. Jenkins as special agent to make the payments. Jenkins made the payment to A. J. Brown—Andrew Jackson Brown—agent of the tribe and administrator of the estates of deceased Seminoles. No impeachment of the good faith of J. D. Jenkins is made, as I understand. He paid in perfect good faith the $186,000 to Andrew Jackson Brown, who supposed he had been regularly appointed administrator.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is in slight error there. He paid only $153,000 to Brown, and the remainder, I suppose, he accounted for or else has it on hand.

Mr. SPOONER. Call it $153,000. That does not go to the merit or demerit of what I want to say. I am perfectly willing, and was perfectly willing when this matter was pending in the Senate before, to cure liability upon the part of Jenkins, special agent of the United States, which might arise or be held to arise from the invalidity of the appointment of Andrew Jackson Brown as administrator. If this bill had confined itself to that, I should have no objection whatever to it.

The Senator from Colorado has paid a tribute to Governor Crawford. So far as I know it is a just one. I have never heard anything against Governor Crawford, and I have heard much in his favor. If the Senator from Colorado is right, if these Indians were citizens of the United States, I know of no reason, none has been given, why they were not bound by the contracts which they made with Governor Crawford under which he was paid by Andrew Jackson Brown the $27,000.

Andrew Jackson Brown, Mr. President, from the papers, was something of a Pooh-Bah. He never ought to have been appointed administrator of these estates, nor do I think he should have been the agent of the tribe. But that was for them to determine. These Indians were creditors of the firm of which Andrew Jackson Brown was a member and of which he was an agent, and as the administrator——

Mr. TELLER. I understand it was a corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well; he was a stockholder in the corporation, and he was its agent, and acting as administrator he dealt with himself.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether he was the agent of the company or not. He paid the money over to the company. Whether he was the agent of the company I never heard.

Mr. SPOONER. It is so stated by the Department of the Interior. As administrator, appointed not by the United States but appointed by the court, representing the estates of deceased Seminoles, he dealt with himself and with his own financial interests. He paid over to the company—the letter signed by Mr. Leupp, Commissioner, shows—all this money, or, as it is put here, he collected from himself as administrator of Seminole estates for the Wewoka Trading Company, of which firm he was a partner, you may say, of which company he was a stockholder, and for which he acted as agent, $72,783.84.

Every lawyer knows, and every fair-minded man knows without being a lawyer, that he could not properly act in that double capacity, for if there is one thing clear above another it is that trustees can make no profit out of the trust estate for themselves; that administrators shall not be permitted to represent the estate of another and deal with it at the same time from a selfish and personal standpoint.

I agree with the Senator from Colorado that notwithstanding Andrew Jackson Brown's appointment as administrator was technically illegal, because of some mistake in the law, adults from whom he took receipts and to whom he paid what they were entitled to receive would not be able to recover the money again from him. They would in equity be estopped. They would have dealt with him as administrator, they would have received from him what belonged to them, and that would be the end of it.

But it is different as to the minors. What became of their money? It does not appear from the papers here that the children of deceased loyal Seminole Indians had any guardians appointed by law. It is not presented, as shown by these papers, that Andrew Jackson Brown stopped for that in his payment of money belonging to minors. He paid over to the guardians by nature, as these papers show. One of the guardians by nature had died; it may have been the father, it may have been the mother. Then what happened, Mr. President? The guardian by nature paid back to Andrew Jackson Brown, the papers show, the debts incurred by these minors to this trading concern and their proportion of the fee due to the attorneys.

Who spoke for the minors in that transaction—for the Indian girls and the Indian boys? I have not understood that the guardian by nature has control of the estate of the ward, while the guardian by nature does have control of the person.

So Andrew Jackson Brown, as administrator, paid over to the guardian by nature, or whom he considered the guardian by nature, money due to these minors or to their estates, and then he takes from this guardian by nature into the coffers of his trading company the debts incurred by these minors. It is not in evidence here that they were consulted about it. It seems from the papers that Andrew Jackson Brown was the tribunal which audited these accounts and which passed upon the obligations due from these minors, fixing the amounts, to this trading company.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not this bill provide in such a manner that the minors may still have an action against Brown? I am simply asking for information.

Mr. SPOONER. The minors would need no such provision if it were not understood that the bill in its relation to Andrew Jackson Brown means something, and if it does mean anything it is a fraud upon the children of the loyal Seminole Indians who have passed away and left their children to be protected by others.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Possibly the Senator gets the idea from the bill that it must be a fraud upon some one, but the method of this appointment has already been explained to the Senator, and the question of the technicality, so far as Brown is concerned, I do not understand that it relieves him from anything except the technicality in the matter of his appointment.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am not speaking of the technicality of the appointment or the invalidity of the appointment.

Mr. McCUMBER. What else does it relieve him from?

Mr. SPOONER. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right.

Mr. SPOONER. Nor does the bill speak of the appointment or the technical invalidity of the appointment. It would have the effect probably, for it is blindly, but not unadroitly, drawn in that respect, to validate the appointment. But it goes away beyond that:

> The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James D. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior—

I do not object to that. Here Andrew Jackson Brown, who did not represent the United States, with whose transactions the Congress of the United States has legitimately no concern whatever, comes in—> and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed.

It is all right to legalize the disbursements of the special agent of the United States, but why is there wrought industriously into this provision language which ratifies or is intended to ratify and confirm the disbursements made by this administrator appointed by the court to the cestui que trust whom he represented in law? Why is that here? Once legalize the payment by Jenkins to Brown, so far as the United States is concerned, and that relieves Jenkins. I have no objection to that. But why go beyond that, some one tell me, and thrust the Congress of the United States between this administrator de bonis non as to his disbursements and these heirs of deceased loyal Seminoles? I can discover no good reason, Mr. President, for that provision in an act of Congress, and no good reason has been given.

It is said that these disbursements were reported to the court and were approved in vacation, and therefore are invalid. As to adults, I agree with the Senator from Colorado, the disbursements are closed transactions. As to the minors, they are not. If Congress had the power to ratify the payments by Andrew Jackson Brown to guardians by nature, whoever they were, to collect back from the guardian by nature what Andrew Jackson Brown thought belonged and was due or claimed as due to his trading company, what has the Congress to do with it?

The Senator from Colorado says they are American citizens. Very well; that does not better it. That does not remove the difficulty; it simply intensifies it. Why should the Congress step between American citizens who are minors and an administrator whose distribution of the money which belongs to them they challenge?

I wonder if notice was given to these guardians by nature of the settlement of these accounts? It does not appear here. Lawsuits are pending down there, not brought by the Government, but the Government rightly, as a matter of common and decent justice to the dead Seminoles who enlisted under our banner during the war to preserve this Government, have employed special attorneys to see that these minor heirs of deceased loyal Seminole Indians are not wronged by Andrew Jackson Brown. If their money has been paid to some one to whom it could not be lawfully paid, they are not bound by it, and the Congress ought not to put in any act language which would bind them by it, if the Congress has the power. The Senator from Colorado says Congress has not the power.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator think it does?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it does; and that leads me to inquire why so much toil and labor are expended in keeping in the bill a provision which its friends admit is invalid.

I think it will conserve one purpose, Mr. President. I think this declaration by the Congress of the United States will be deemed by the Indians to mean something, and it may discourage them from pursuing the remedies to which in law they are entitled. But upon what principle of law and upon what principle of fair play, Mr. President, upon what ground consistent with a sense of duty to those people, only a little time ago made citizens, do we bestow such tender care upon the financial interests of Andrew Jackson Brown? He is looking after his own interests. There was no one here except the Department to look after the interests of those who need it most. Andrew Jackson Brown, so far as these papers show, needs no guardian. He looked after his interests and he will continue to do it.

But it is a precedent, Mr. President, which never can be defended. And after passing this law it is provided here (a provision which has no earthly sense except upon the hypothesis that what precedes it so far as Andrew Jackson Brown is concerned is without validity) that this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him. When you once legalize the payment by Jenkins to Andrew Jackson Brown, of course that is a valid payment as far as the Government is concerned, and that ought to be done. But the Government has no relation to Mr. Andrew Jackson Brown. It has no claim against him for any improper expenditure of the money. The Government is not to call him to account for infidelity in the discharge of a trust. That is a matter for the courts, Mr. President. Why not leave it to the courts? Why invoke the action of Congress? Will some one tell me?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. SPOONER. I would be glad to hear the Senator do it. Will some one tell me? I should like to know it now. I am curious to hear it. I beg the Senator to tell me now.

Mr. TELLER. When the Senator gets through, I will.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator a question as a legal proposition. It has been controverted, not on the floor, but outside.

> Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

Would that, in the Senator's judgment, apply to pending suits? As the Senator can see, the question was whether we can take away from these parties the right of action, and we added this proviso. Would it interfere with suits that are now pending? Do I make the inquiry clear?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator regard this language, so far as it relates to Andrew Jackson Brown as administrator de bonis non, of any legal effect, if it shall be enacted?

Mr. CLAPP. So far as I am personally concerned, of course, I do not. I do not believe that Congress can interfere with the rights of those Indians in their claims. But if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I made the statement some time ago that there is not a line in the bill, if it became a law, which would interfere with a pending suit. That statement was vigorously challenged, and I appeal to the Senator, as a legal proposition, if I was not correct?

Mr. SPOONER. Now, let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like an answer to some of my questions.

Mr. SPOONER. I will answer the Senator's question, but I should like to ask him another question. Upon what possible theory, if he thinks this language is of no legal effect, is it here?

Mr. CLAPP. Upon the same theory that time after time, when we passed legislation, and it may be said that that legislation, as a legal proposition, could affect rights, we add, at the close of a section, "Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed" so and so, simply out of supercaution, which has grown up as a practice in legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not been here a great many years, but I have been an attentive member of the Senate while I have been here. This is the first time I have ever known any suggestion or attempt to put a validating act of this sort or any sort between an administrator and the estate which he was appointed to represent.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. What is it for, then? Is it to protect Andrew Jackson Brown against the claim of the Government? If you pass this provision legalizing the payment of $186,000 by Jenkins to Brown he goes free of that.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say I think the act would be practically the same if Andrew Jackson Brown's claim is stricken out.

Mr. SPOONER. It would not be the same to Andrew Jackson Brown.

Mr. TELLER. It would be the same to him.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Why not strike it out?

Mr. SPOONER and Mr. TELLER. It can not be stricken out.

Mr. CLAPP. It was at the House provision that this Senate amendment was aimed.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator desires me, as the question has been asked why so much fuss about this provision, I will tell him. I am engaged on a conference committee, who have sent me word that they want me, and if the Senator will permit me, I will make a statement in a minute, and he will see where the committee stand.

Mr. President, we put this in to ratify the action of Brown and dispense with some technicality. After we had agreed to it, the Department sent up this statement. Thereupon I think the chairman or somebody drafted it so that it should not interfere with any litigation. That we thought was sufficient. When the Senator from South Carolina found fault with it, the Senator who had the bill in charge said specifically that it would go out if there was any objection to it. When it went into conference and got in the proper place, they found it could not go out, because the House would not allow it to go out. A member of the committee from the House, who knows all about these transactions and who probably has had more to do with Indian Affairs than all the men in the Senate [Mr. CURTIS], would not let it be stricken out.

I will wait until the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] instructs the Senator from Wisconsin what he wants him to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin is not instructed by the Senator from South Carolina. I was giving him a statement of fact. I will give it to the Senator if he wants it.

Mr. TELLER. You may give it later.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

Mr. TELLER. That was somewhat embarrassing to the chairman of the committee, who had it in hand. So it went into the bill and became a part of the bill. When the time came for the passage of this bill, we put it in the amendment. Everybody agreed that it should go in. The chairman spoke to me about it. I said if there was any trouble about this matter, repeal it; I do not care.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will remember that I introduced it.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. I did not think it was necessary to repeal it, and I do not think so now. We agreed to that. Thereupon, when it went to the House it was our amendment. Then it was for the House to agree to that amendment; but the House said, "No; we will not agree to it." So there we were.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator will wait a minute until I get through. He has plenty of time, while I have to leave to attend a committee meeting.

This is an appropriation bill, which we are anxious to complete. It has come back here. I suppose if the Senate says the provision shall not go out, and it goes back to conference, we shall be met just as we were met before, and the House committee will say it shall stay in. I was entirely willing that the chairman should leave it out; I never asked him to leave it in; but we had no opportunity to leave it in.

We are in this position, Mr. President: This bill is here, and we are asked to set aside this conference report, and send it back to the House to be dealt with in a manner that does not at all require our interference. If Mr. Andrew Jackson Brown has done anything wrong, the courts are open to every man down there; if he is not responsible, I presume the bond he has given to the Government will probably bring that out, so that these people will get their money.

We are anxious to get this bill through, Mr. President. If we send it back, we shall probably have the same controversy over again. So far as I am concerned, I am going to dismiss this case.

Mr. SPOONER. Before the Senator does that, I hope he will permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. TELLER. I propose to go down and attend to some other duties. It is perfectly inconsequential, so far as I am concerned, what is done with the report, except I wished to say what I have said here to vindicate the committee against what I regard as unfounded and improper charges of either incompetence on our part, or what might be considered worse.

Mr. SPOONER. While the Senator from Colorado was out, I took occasion to say that I had no strictures to make upon the committee at all, and I had informed the Senate that this was forced upon them by the House conferees. That I repeat.

In all human probability, Mr. President, this provision will stay in the bill. I opposed it before; I protest against it now, and I put it in the RECORD—and that is why I speak—as a precedent which never ought to be in the RECORD in a case like this.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just want to make a statement, and it is this: In the first instance, the amendment which the Senate put on the Five Civilized Tribes bill was objectionable; but the House accepted it, and the Senate conferees were helpless. In the second case, the amendment which the Senate put into this bill repealed the other, and the House made the Senate give way, or the Senate conferees did give way; they yielded. They were not at the mercy of the House.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I will describe the condition of the conferees. They were very much in the same condition that the conferees headed by the Senator from South Carolina were on the rate bill when the House insisted that they should take the express companies out of that bill and relieve it of that provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. That means, if it means anything, that the House conferees on this bill said to the Senate conferees, "If you do not take this out, we will report a disagreement." Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. CLAPP. I mean, Mr. President, that I do not believe we can get this provision out. We tried it in the first instance, as I explained to the Senator from South Carolina, upon a personal plea that was embarrassing, in view of the understanding that we had; we tried it again on this bill, but the House conferees insist that they will not let this amendment go in.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, that causes me to say what I would not otherwise say—that one of the House conferees, who are now charged with being responsible for having the Senate amendment stricken out, tells me that the House conferees did not do that.

Mr. CLAPP. That is a mistake.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, there you are.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I think that is a pretty fair illustration of the soundness of the usage which precludes statements by conferees as to what occurs in a conference committee.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Some time ago, early in my chairmanship of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I took occasion to inquire of several older members of the Senate, and was informed that what took place in a conference was always a proper subject of discussion in the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that the amendment under discussion is marked on the bill reported by the conference committee as amendment No. 58, if I am correct. The Senate report shows that the Senate has receded from amendment No. 58.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senate could not very well recede from it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator must not forget that the Senate amendment was to repeal the original Brown proviso, the validating proviso. The amendment in this bill is to repeal the other; and when the Senate recedes, it restores the other to the law, of course.

Mr. NELSON. According to the conference report, amendment No. 58 is out of the bill, the Senate having receded, if this report is correct.

Mr. TILLMAN. In receding, the Senate merely gave up the provision in the original bill, and by holding in this amendment we repeal the other. Senators ought not to get the two things mixed.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have not much more to say. It is perfectly clear to me, as I think it will be clear to everyone, what this provision, so far as it relates to Mr. Brown, is understood to mean. The proviso, in that view, would be of no meaning whatever unless the language which I object to means something. As it is, if the gentlemen who favor this—that is, those who are promoting it—I do not mean in the Senate—are correct, it will destroy any cause of action of these minors and then provide that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent their bringing suit.

I have no objection to the payment of Governor Crawford. That may be right in amount, and it may not be right. There are other evidences in this paper officially reported here by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to Mr. Brown. There is too much Brown in this whole business—not "too much Johnson," but too much Brown. Here is a sort of side light thrown on the transactions of administrator de bonis non Andrew Jackson Brown. Here is the Seminole agreement of July 1, 1898, which provides, among other things, that—

> The town site of Wewoka shall be controlled and disposed of according to the provisions of an act of the general council of the Seminole Nation, approved April 23, 1897, relative thereto, and on extinguishment of the tribal government deeds of conveyance shall issue to owners of lots as herein provided for allottees and all lots remaining unsold at that time may be sold in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

A. J. Brown—

Andrew Jackson Brown; the same Brown—brother of the principal chief—

Who was also a Brown, I take it—

> A. J. Brown, brother of the principal chief, was made secretary of the commission to dispose of the Wewoka town site. This commission selected a tract of 640 acres, within the boundaries of which were permanent improvements claimed by the said Secretary Brown, and 160 acres within the town-site limits were set aside for said Brown, as provided by section 3 of the Seminole act.
>
> In February, 1900, John F. Brown, principal chief of the nation, submitted to the commission a proposition on behalf of himself and his brother, A. J. Brown, to purchase the lots remaining unsold for the lump sum of $12,000. During about three years following the organization of the commission and prior to February, 1900, only seven lots were sold, and the proposal of John F. Brown was accepted and the transaction concluded by the execution of a deed dated February 12, 1900, to John F. Brown, purporting to convey all of the lots in the town site of Wewoka remaining unsold and not otherwise disposed of. The legality of these proceedings was questioned and the Seminole Nation made an investigation, and on December 16, 1903, passed an act declaring that the sale of the town site by the town-site commission "was done in accordance with the law governing the same."
> There was still a question as to the validity of the sale of the town site of Wewoka, and Congress, by the act of March 3, 1903 (33 Stats., 1048, 1085), confirmed and ratified the action of the town-site commissioners in disposing of the unsold lots in the town to John F. Brown.
> The records of this office show that A. J. Brown—

Who was made the secretary of this commission—was interested in the purchase and—

The commissioner adds—

> In my opinion Congress has been very lenient with the Browns, so I earnestly recommend that you request that the amendment herein mentioned be eliminated from the bill and that the question of determining whether the distribution was properly made by Mr. Brown be left to the courts.

That is the fair thing to do, Mr. President. That is what the courts are for. If Mr. Brown has been an unfaithful administrator, if these payments by him as administrator to himself as agent of the Wewoka Trading Company were not just, if they are impeachable for fraud, they can be taken care of in the courts. If the interests of these minors who are represented by Mr. Andrew Jackson Brown, administrator, have been spoliated by Mr. Andrew Jackson Brown, the agent, or Mr. Andrew Jackson Brown in propria persona, the court, not Congress, is the place to protect their interests.

As I have said before, I suppose the provision will stay in the bill, but I shall conclude, as I began, Mr. President, by expressing the opinion that it is a vicious and absolutely indefensible precedent that ought not to find its place in any enactment of Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, during the time the Senator from Wisconsin has been discussing this provision I have tried to figure out how anyone under it can be deprived of any legal right which he or she may have against Andrew Jackson Brown. The name appears here as "A. J. Brown," but I presume it is Andrew Jackson Brown, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I took that from the Commissioner's report.

Mr. McCUMBER. I presume it is the same person.

Mr. President, possibly it may be necessary to go over this case briefly once again. Mr. Jenkins was appointed an agent to make the payments; A. J. Brown was appointed administrator for the estate of deceased Seminoles. There are two propositions. Since the appointment of A. J. Brown some question has arisen as to its legality. For instance, the power of appointing referred to a certain statute of the State of Arkansas, I think it was, which was presumed to have effect in the Indian Territory. There was a question about that. The next question that arose was as to the confirmation of the payments made by A. J. Brown. It was afterwards held that the confirmation of the payments ought to have been in open court, instead of by the judge in chambers. So far as the difference between having the report confirmed in open court and confirmed before the judge in chambers is concerned, there can be no possible question. It was a mere technicality. The same judge acts in either instance. The result would have been exactly the same. But so far the payments made by Andrew Jackson Brown have not been legalized by the action of a court, although they have been legalized so far as the judge of that court could have legalized them by his action.

Another party comes on the scene. It is an attorney who wants to bring an action against Andrew Jackson Brown to recover the whole $150,000 paid. On what ground? Not on the ground that it was improperly paid, not on the ground that it was paid to the wrongful parties, but on the ground—a technical one—that his acts have never been confirmed and therefore the payments made by him are illegal. The action which is brought is not an action for a few of these to recover in cases where error might have been made, but an action to recover the whole sum. Who is paying for this? Who is paying the attornew to recover this money?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not just now. Somebody has got to make the payment. Who is it? It is not the individual who has received his money and is satisfied with it. It is paid out of the fund that belongs to these same minors, and soon that fund will be exhausted and they will receive nothing.

As stated in the beginning, I tried to find some way by which I could agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that some one would be injured by this provision. Every person who has a claim against Andrew Jackson Brown has, under the provisions of this bill, a right to bring that action, because it is provided that nothing in the bill shall prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him. No individual is excepted from the operation of that provision. He would have that right independent of the provision. The object sought to be accomplished, if I understand the object—of course, there may have been something in the mind of the drafter of the amendment or of the bill as it was originally introduced which is not clear—but, as we all understand it, the object was to confirm the payments so far as this technical objection was concerned, and make it impossible for the attorney bringing an action to base it wholly upon that technicality and yet at the same time to provide clearly that it should not cut off any plain, legal right where there was any claim for money due from the administrator. Now I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. As the Senator has stated the case, it is a very clear and pleasant transaction; but I want to ask the Senator whether or not it is altogether fair to the Senate for him to make an ex parte statement without any evidence but merely the statement of the attorneys who are interested to protect Brown; and instead of letting the Senate hold on to this amendment, take out this provision and let the court settle it, we should go forward on the statement of the attorneys who are here to defend Brown and who are employed by Brown to keep this amendment out—I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that altogether fair?

Mr. McCUMBER. Therein, Mr. President, always lies the trouble when a Senator finds fault with a committee about a matter as to which he has not the requisite information. The Senator from South Carolina assumes that there was no evidence, no report, nothing, before that committee, except the bare statement of some counsel appearing on behalf of Mr. Brown. We had before us, Mr. President, at that time the same letters of which he spoke, and we had the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who investigated it on his own account. I did not go into the question of his investigation, because the general committee often leaves it to a subcommittee to report and often takes the word of a Senator as to what the result of his investigation has been.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless, all the evidence that has been produced, including that filed by the chairman of the committee on Saturday evening, bears out the statement that I made, that there is nothing here whatever to show upon what the Senate had acted except the plea or memorandum of the attorneys in the case. And when we try to have the matter referred back to the courts, where it is now pending, to let the courts settle it and determine whether or not Brown has robbed the Indians, the Senator gets up and makes an ex parte statement, with no evidence to back it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, I am not making an ex parte statement, with no evidence to back it. I am making the statement upon the evidence which was before the committee, of which I am a member and of which the Senator from South Carolina is not a member.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not produce it and put it in the RECORD?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand something about this case and what testimony has been produced, and I reassert that the only object of this amendment is to cure that technical defect which made the administrator responsible for the mere fact that, instead of having his account confirmed by the court in open court, it was confirmed before the judge in chambers, or the court in chambers, as it is sometimes called. That, of course, makes an illegal confirmation, and any attorney bringing an action upon any claim, although it may be on a claim of a party who has received every dollar, will attack it, first, upon the ground that it was made without his being the proper administrator, and secondly, that it has never been confirmed by the court, as provided by the law.

There is nothing in that case that is unjust or unfair, or that is intended to be unjust or unfair, and, as the Senator from Minnesota has explained—and his contention has not yet been answered—no suit pending is abated and no suit can be abated by the provision of this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have only a word more to say. The Senator just remarked that no suit can be abated. When these suits come to trial, if they should go on, what will the complainants be met with? They will be met with the act of Congress, saying that the acts of Brown and Jenkins are validated, and, of course, the court will throw the suits out, because the law of Congress will declare the suits——

Mr. McCUMBER. This bill does not say that the act of Brown is validated in the case of any improper payment or lack of payment of those funds. On the contrary, it provides that Brown shall be liable to anyone who has any actual claim against him.

Mr. TILLMAN. The trouble is that the minor children who are being protected by the Government now, and whose estates have been taken by Brown, are left to their own individual effort with no money whatever to employ a lawyer, and no estate which a lawyer can get after he wrenches it from Brown. Instead of the Government carrying out its obligations to protect these minors, the Congress steps in and says——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Government would have no right to bring an action in any event. The Government is not a party to it in any way. The Government can provide an attorney, if the Government sees fit to do so; but the attorney who is prosecuting those cases is paid out of the very fund that belongs to the minors of whom the Senator speaks.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not want to prolong this discussion, but I undertake to say that there is not a line in this bill that interferes in any manner with the control now being exercised by the Department, either in the prosecution of these suits, or in the use of the fund that unquestionably is being sought to be used in their prosecution. We do not take this undistributed money out of the hands of the Department. There is not a word in the bill that changes the relation of the Department to the attorney whom they have employed on the suits which he is bringing under the tacit consent and authorization of the Department.

Mr. TILLMAN. And as against that statement of the Senator, I put the statement to the contrary of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], from whom the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] learned law.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; and while I regret the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin, the two questions as to whether this provision interferes with the right of these minors and whether this bill, if passed in this form, would interfere with a pending suit, remain unanswered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin answered them very clearly. All those who have listened at all are in possession of the facts. I have no interest in this matter except this, Mr. President, I want to see the Senate do no wrong; but try to do right. These children are the offspring of men who wore the Federal uniform and who fought against the South. If Republican Senators see fit to approve this report and ratify the wrong perpetrated by Brown against these ex-Union soldiers' orphans, I have no objection. I have done my duty in calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Indian Bureau say this provision ought not to be here. They object to it, and oppose its enactment. The only way the Senate can get this thing right is to reject the report and send the bill back to conference, with instructions to the Senate conferees to stand by the amendment which repealed the original provision.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, on Saturday afternoon I asked the chairman of the committee, who has charge of this conference report, if there was anything in the bill that interfered with the rights of what are known as the "children of intermarried white citizens." I expressed the opinion that I was unable to conclude from the provision before me that any such effect could be given to that provision. The Senator from Minnesota concurred in my view. But when I come to look closer into the matter I find that the trouble is not in the Senate amendment, but the trouble is in the language of the conference report. I submit to the Senate as a question of order that the provision of the conference report is not permissible. It injects into this bill a question which was not in difference between the two Houses—in other words, the conference report incorporates or embodies a provision which had been rejected by the Senate when the bill pertaining to the Five Civilized Tribes was pending here. That particular provision is inserted for the express purpose of denying to these children participation in that land.

I submit as a question of order that the conference committee has exceeded its power in reporting to the Senate a provision which confines this enrollment to minors of Indian blood or to the minors of freedmen.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, this is one instance where I believe the report of the conference committee ought to be rejected and the bill sent back to the conferees to confer again and to eliminate certain features of the conference report.

To give a short history of the matter we were discussing on Saturday ought to convince any man that the item to which I refer should be rejected. In 1891 Congress passed a law directing the Secretary of the Interior to appoint a commission to negotiate with the Colville Indians for the purchase of a certain tract of land. The Secretary of the Interior appointed the commission, and they negotiated the purchase of the land for the sum of $1,500,000. That commission made its report to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior approved it, and sent a letter to the President notifying him that he had approved the report. Mr. Harrison, who was President of the United States at that time, sent a message to Congress recommending that the report be approved by act of Congress. It was approved, and the act approving it set forth that the Government of the United States owed these Indians the sum of $1,500,000. That report also set forth that the money ought to be kept in the Treasury of the United States in trust for these Indians to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

I presume, Mr. President, that this money was kept in the Treasury simply for the benefit of the Indians and was not paid to them in order that their financial interests might be protected. It was clearly a statutory obligation against the Government of the United States.

Now, what is the truth? In 1892 a contract was entered into by certain attorneys for the purpose of recovering this money from the United States for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Georgia will pardon me. The Senate struck out the provision paying the Indians $1,500,000 with 5 per cent interest. That was never passed. The House had it in the bill, but when it came to the Senate that provision was striken out, and the bill became a law with what the Senator refers to as being in the bill stricken out. The money never has been appropriated from that day to this.

Mr. CLAY. That does not change the feature of the argument I intend to make in a very few minutes.

Mr. President, clearly the Government of the United States owed the Indians $1,500,000. In 1892 these attorneys entered into a contract with the Indians to collect this money from the Government of the United States, and the attorneys were to receive 10 per cent of the amount that was recovered. This contract expired nearly four years ago. There was a provision in the contract that if this money were not collected within a period of ten years, the contract was void, and the attorneys should not be entitled to a single cent. In the year 1906 the Committee on Indian Affairs looked over the statutes and they found that this was a legal and a valid claim against the Government of the United States, and the Committee on Indian Affairs inserted a provision in the bill that the $1,500,000 should be paid to the Indians. This contract which had been dead for four years is now revived. How came it to be revived?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I have had some experience in framing this bill, and I am at a loss to find the language in it which revives that expired contract, and I would appreciate it if the Senator would point it out.

Mr. CLAY. My understanding is that it sets forth the fact that there is $1,500,000 coming to the Indians——

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. And you appropriated $150,000 of this sum; and this amendment is intended to utilize that sum for the purpose of paying these attorneys.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator is mistaken. We do not, as I read the amendment, appropriate $150,000; and that is just the trouble and just where this whole difficulty arises.

The Senate did appropriate $150,000, and no doubt in view of the fact that some of that money would be used for paying attorneys, the conferees yielded to a suggestion striking out the appropriation of $150,000 and inserting in lieu thereof that the attorneys might bring their suits in the Court of Claims; and that is what has given rise to this discussion.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator this question: The Senator does not deny that we owe $1,500,000 to the Indians. The Senator does not deny that this bill recognizes the justice of the claim?

Mr. CLAPP. Which claim?

Mr. CLAY. I mean the claim of the Indians against the Government of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Should this bill become a law, it will be the first act of Congress since the land was taken which does recognize it.

Mr. CLAY. Then I am right.

Mr. CLAPP. But the Senator said we appropriated $150,000.

Mr. CLAY. I did not.

Mr. CLAPP. Why——

Mr. CLAY. I said this bill recognizes the validity of a claim on the part of the Indians——

Mr. CLAPP. Unquestionably.

Mr. CLAY. Against the Government of the United States——

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. For a million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. I am correct. I knew I was right.

Mr. CLAPP. What I was correcting was the statement that this went on to appropriate.

Mr. CLAY. I did not intend to say that.

Mr. CLAPP. I am sure you did not intend to say it, but you said it.

Mr. CLAY. I say the bill recognizes the validity of this claim, and that the bill is proper, and that the validity of the claim should be recognized.

I wish to say that the contract of these attorneys expired four years ago, as the contract expressly provided that in the event the attorneys did not recover the money within a period of ten years the contract should be void, and that they should not receive a single dollar.

Now, what does this amendment attempt to do? It undertakes to give life to a dead contract, to a contract that has been dead for a period of four years. It was drawn——

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator can point out the language that does that, I wish he would do so.

Mr. CLAY. I can point it out very easily.

Mr. CLAPP. Let us understand what the Senator says. The other time, as I understood the Senator, he said we validated this extinct and expired contract. Afterwards I understood him to say that he did not intend to say that.

Mr. CLAY. I was not discussing that feature of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. You certainly referred to it.

Mr. CLAY. Here is what I want to call the Senator's attention to. The contract made with the attorneys to pay them 10 per cent expressly provided that they should recover the money within the period of ten years, and that if they did not recover it within a period of ten years, the contract should expire and they should not have anything.

What did these attorneys do? They found that the United States Senate had done justice to the Indians, had give them a million and a half of dollars, and the bill passed the House and the Senate without a word being said about these attorneys. They go to the conferees and try to reap the benefit of the services of the Senate to the Indians and to secure $150,000, to which they have no legal right or claim. This amendment was drawn by a sharp, shrewd lawyer, who drew it in his own interest. It deserves the condemnation of the Senate. I do not hesitate to say that I have no patience with a practice that has grown up whereby we pass legislation and it goes to a conference committee, and the conferees put new and distinct matter in the bill, and Senators are compelled to vote against the entire bill in order to reject such an objectionable item in the conference report.

Mr. President, it is surprising to know the unjust legislation that frequently creeps into bills in conference committees.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CLAY. In one moment.

Mr. PILES. I want to correct——

Mr. CLAY. I will yield directly.

I want to call especial attention to this provision:

> And jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment in the name of Butler & vale (Marion Butler and Josiah M. Vale), attorneys and counselors at law, of the city of Washington, D. C., for the amount of compensation which shall be paid to the attorneys who have performed services as counsel on behalf of said Indians in the prosecution of the claim of said Indians for payment for said land, and in determining the amount of compensation for such services the court may consider all contracts or agreements heretofore entered into by said Indians with attorneys.

Now, mark you this: If this claim was before the court without any instruction from Congress, and the court examined the contract and found that it had expired four years ago, any court which had any respect for the law would dismiss the case. These attorneys come into the Senate and they say: "Our contract is dead; we never recovered this money but Congress has awakened to the fact that the Indians were entitled to the money. We see this bill is going through the Senate. We will slip in and get the conferees to give us a hundred and fifty thousand dollars and to put life into a contract which has been dead for four years; dead and buried long, long ago."

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Last Saturday the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] took occasion to compliment the committee upon the wisdom of inserting this provision. He did not go as much into detail as he might have gone.

As I understand, after this contract expired in 1904, individual contracts were obtained with these Indians; and an Indian, as a rule, will pay that which he believes he is morally obligated to pay. So it seemed better that Congress should refer the matter, in which the Indians were bound morally by the contracts they had entered into since 1904, to the disposition of a court rather than to permit them to attempt to settle it or to leave these people to settle with the Indians when the money was paid over. The Senator from Massachusetts was right when he did commend the wisdom of the committee in doing that.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. If this was a just and legal claim, and the Committee on Indian Affairs knew it to be a just claim when the bill was pending before that committee and when the amendment was adopted appropriating a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, why did not the Committee on Indian Affairs offer this amendment and give the Senate a chance to pass upon it?

Mr. CLAPP. A simple answer to that is found in the history of any legislation that passes Congress. The question betrays its own weakness. There is not a bill that passes Congress but which, before it finally gets to the President, has amendments put upon it which were not contained in it originally. "If those amendments were wise," it might be asked, "why were they not suggested earlier?"

The fact is, at the time the bill passed the Senate, this matter had not reached this stage of consideration. We were then setting aside $150,000, knowing that the contracts existed, knowing that these claims existed; but when we came into conference and began to get nearer to the solution of this question, it seemed infinitely better, instead of leaving the $150,000 in a gross sum, subject to the claims of the attorneys upon the moral obligation, to send it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CLAPP. I have not the floor, really.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me?

Mr. CLAY. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The objection that the Senator from Georgia makes, that this revives an expired contract, it seems to me could have been obviated by providing that the court should consider only valid and existing contracts.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator from Texas hold that simply authorizing the court to take into account the terms of a contract, where they are fixing compensation, where they are to ascertain the quantum meruit, revives that contract?

Mr. BAILEY. I think it does when it is provided for in this language, because it declares that the court may consider all contracts or agreements heretofore entered into. That is authority to the court not only to consider those contracts as mere evidences of the value of the services, but as instruments upon which a judgment may be predicated.

I desire to say that my experience is somewhat different from that of the Senator from Minnesota. He tells the Senate that the Indians will pay anything that appeals to their sense of moral obligation. Probably that was true before they were contaminated by too close association with white people, but since the Indians have become American citizens in the Indian Territory they stand upon the law.

Mr. CLAPP. They think they have all of the rights of citizens.

Mr. BAILEY. They think they have them, and my judgment is they will exercise them. I think if Congress will send these attorneys with their expired contracts to the Indian Territory, merely conferring upon those courts the power to hear and determine any valid and existing contract against the Indians——

Mr. TILLMAN. These are blanket Indians in Oregon.

Mr. CLAY. Washington.

Mr. TILLMAN. Washington.

Mr. BAILEY. That is so far from my home that I am not willing to express an opinion about it, but I am not inclined to believe that the sense of moral obligation is stronger in the State of Washington than it is in the Indian Territory, which is the home of the Indians of whom I speak. But possibly if these Indians still wear blankets they may be so simple-minded as to perform an expired contract. However, I think it ought to be left to them and that they ought not to be dragged into the Court of Claims and made to answer for what they are not obliged to pay.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. DUBOIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was simply going to ask the Senator from Texas whether he ever knew an Indian, if he had the money, to refuse to pay the first man who came to him who had a legal claim upon him?

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator let me answer that question? I am sure these attorneys, from the way the amendment has been drawn, will be the first men to get to the Indian.

Mr. BAILEY. Just as a tribute to a vanishing race, I will answer the Senator from North Dakota by saying that the Indian does almost universally pay his honest debts, and I beg also to add that when the Indians are pursued by remorseless creditors like these they never escape.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. DUBOIS. I simply desire to correct a mistake into which I think the Senator from Texas has fallen, as well as the Senator from Georgia. In the first place, the contract was made in 1894 for 15 per cent, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior for 10 per cent. That contract expired only two years ago, not four years ago. During its life the Senate recommended the payment of this money. After the expiration of the approved contract the attorneys, who had been diligent enough, but Congress had not acted, made another contract with the Indians for 10 per cent. That contract has not been approved.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. He speaks of a second contract, and it has been spoken of very often, but no one has stated what it was or when it was made.

Mr. DUBOIS. The second contract was similar to the first contract, providing for the payment to the attorneys of 10 per cent of the money recovered. But that contract was not approved by the Secretary of the Interior. I refer to the second contract made in 1904. The approved contract expired in 1904. Another contract which has not been approved by the Secretary was made in 1904.

Mr. PETTUS. When was it made?

Mr. DUBOIS. In 1904.

Mr. CLAY. Why was not the latter contract approved by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not know. Probably because there was a different Secretary of the Interior. My observation is that the Secretary of the Interior approves some contracts identical in terms with others which he will not approve. Here were two contracts precisely the same, one of which the Secretary of the Interior approved and the other the Secretary of the Interior did not approve.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, this is a very peculiar claim. It is reported by the conference committee and inserted in this bill, and the Senate has no information from the committee in regard to the terms of these contracts except what it can get from the Interior Department. The Senate committee has not set forth these contracts. The committee has not given the Senate any of the particulars in regard to these contracts. This amendment has never been discussed by the Committee on Indian Affairs. There was nothing in the amendment adopted by the Senate to indicate that the Senate committee intended to deal with this subject in any way whatever. And in truth and in fact this amendment has never been dealt with by the Senate committee and has never been considered by anybody except the conferees.

Look how this amendment is drawn. I do not know who drew it. It is drawn in such a way that the judgment must be rendered in favor of Marion Butler and Josiah M. Vale, and it also provides—

The same—

That is, the money—to be apportioned among said attorneys by said Butler and Vale.

I have understood from the statements on the floor of the Senate that only $15,000 was to go to any particular firm of lawyers, but the amendment is drawn in such a way that the Secretary of the Treasury must pay to Marion Butler and Josiah Vale a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, if this is found to be the correct sum, and these gentlemen are to say how much shall be paid to the other attorneys. They are certainly made the masters of the situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator did not, of course, have before him the facts the Committee on Indian Affairs had. A contract has been entered into between the other attorneys and Butler and Vale, constituting the latter the attorneys in whose favor the payment shall be made, and the contract provides for a division among the other attorneys according to the amount of work done.

Mr. CLAY. I know the Senate is anxious to vote on this report and to get through with it, but I will yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] for a minute. I had forgotten.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I wish to refer to one statement made by the Senator from Georgia, feeling that it is my duty to do so in view of the fact that a very distinguished lawyer in my State, one of the ex-justices of the supreme court of that State, represents, among other lawyers, these Indians in this claim.

I understood the Senator from Georgia to say that the lawyers did nothing with this matter until Congress had provided for the payment of a million and a half dollars, and then the lawyers went before the conferees and had their claim of $150,000 recognized.

So far as concerns my relations with this matter, they are these: When I first took my seat in this body, one of the lawyers in this case in my State wrote me with reference to the south half of the Colville Reservation, saying he hoped I would insist, when that part of the reservation was opened, upon the payment of the just claim of a million and a half which the Government owed the Indians for the north half of that reservation. I wrote to him, telling him that when I had traveled through the north half of the Colville Reservation I had learned, as I recalled, from gentlemen living in that section of the country that the Indians were not entitled to that sum of money, and I did not see my way clear to support the claim, but that I would be perfectly willing to investigate the matter, and if I found they were entitled to the money, to support it.

The attorney then laid before me the record in the case and the proof showing to my mind conclusively that the Indians were entitled to that money. It developed that the chief justice of the State of Washington had acted as one of the commissioners to effect the contract between the United States and the Indians, under the terms of which they were entitled to $1,500,000. Upon that understanding I have supported and am supporting this claim of the Indians for $1,500,000. Therefore I know from my personal knowledge that at least one attorney in this case did represent the Indians long before Congress recognized this claim.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether or not the solicitude in this instance arose for the Indians to get their money or for the lawyers to get their fees.

Mr. PILES. The statement to me on behalf of the Indians was that they were entitled to this money.

Mr. TILLMAN. But it seems that all the money that will be paid will go to the lawyers, and the Indians will have to get another lawyer to come here and collect the balance.

Mr. PILES. I do not understand that to be the case at all. All I understand about the matter is that these lawyers have a right to go before the Court of Claims and prove whether or not they are entitled to $1 or to $150,000, and whatever they are entitled to, if anything, they will have a right to recover. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. My friend from South Carolina seems to be especially severe against the lawyers. I have no patience with his continual attempt to prevent the lawyers from recovering their fees. My own opinion is that the $150,000 in this transaction is none too large. But lawyers are expected to collect their fees under existing contracts, and if those contracts expire, of if they fail to perform their duty under the contract according to its terms, I do not believe the Congress ought to revive any contract in their favor.

If there were no question about the expiration of this contract, I would not hesitate one minute to give these people not only the right to go to the court to recover it, but, under the facts, I would make the direct appropriation to it. But the trouble here is that according to their contract these lawyers are not entitled to this money. I do not think that a lawyer ought to be permitted to take advantage of an expired contract any more than anybody else, nor do I think the fact that he is a lawyer deprives him of his right until it has expired.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, just a word and I am through, because I know we want to vote on this report.

I will say to the Senator from Washington that I have great respect for his judgment, and have always had since I have known him. I am unable to understand, however, how he ever reached the conclusion, after reading the statutes, that the Indians were not entitled to this money. I reached the conclusion the very minute I read the law. It did not seem to me to be disputable at all.

Mr. PILES. No; the Senator——

Mr. CLAY. I understand the Secretary of the Interior has recognized the validity of this claim and has recommended its payment time and again.

Mr. PILES. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. CLAY. Originally, I will say to the Senator, it was not intended that this money should be paid to the Indians. It was intended that the money should be kept in trust by the Secretary of the Treasury for their benefit, to be paid out at such time as Congress might recommend hereafter. We have frequently, I will say to the Senator, pursued that course. We have frequently done so because the Indians in many instances are spendthrifts, and being their guardian, our Government has undertaken frequently to keep their money and use it and pay it to them in such a way as they might need it.

But what I object to in this case is that here is an amendment that has never been considered by the Senate at all. I believe that with the facts before us we should leave it out of this conference report, and that if it were left out of the conference report and voted on separately it would be overwhelmingly defeated.

It is an easy matter for a man with a doubtful claim to go before a conference committee. I make no reflection upon the conference committee; they are honorable men; but I say it is an easy matter for a man with a doubtful claim to go before a conference committee and to have inserted new matter of a doubtful character that would be overwhelmingly defeated in the Senate if brought into the Senate before it was inserted in the conference report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to know when this bad practice will ever stop if the Senate gives way whenever such a provision gets into a conference report on an appropriation bill? If the bill is full of improper things, steals, I have almost said, are we just simply going to swallow them because they are in the conference report?

Mr. CLAY. I intend to vote against this conference report. I believe it ought to be defeated. I think we ought to send it back to the conference committee and let the conference committees know that they shall not pass upon anything except matters that are in dispute between the House and the Senate. This matter was never thought of on the floor of the Senate. It was never discussed by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was inserted, as is my understanding, just before the committee came to a conclusion, and inserted without the Senate ever even considering it.

Mr. President, the committee ought to have had these contracts before them. They ought to have known about the services that have been performed. They ought to have been familiar with the case from the beginning to the end, and to have reported the facts to the Senate, and the Senate ought to have had an opportunity to pass upon the merits of this claim. I believe that the claim ought to be defeated, and at least that it ought never to have been inserted in the bill by the conferees.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, whatever may be the difference between Senators so far as a proper conclusion to be drawn is concerned, they certainly ought not to draw upon their imagination for the facts in any given case. The facts ought to be settled between them before they make that the basis of an argument. I can excuse the Senator from Georgia for errors as to what the facts are, because he took no part in the investigation of the matters before the committee of conference or before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I believe that I can make this clear. I believe that I can dispel the fog that seems to surround it to some extent, going over very briefly indeed some of the facts in this case.

Here were a number of Indians, several tribes, known as the Colville tribes of Indians. They occupied a large section of country in the Territory of Washington, afterwards the State of Washington. There was a question as to where they came from. There was a question as to what title they had, whether they had the Indian title or a mere possessory title. Afterwards it seems that the Department itself, not being certain as to what the Indian title of that land was, and thinking that the Indians did not at least need all of it, made a departmental order which placed those Indians within circumscribed bounds, much less than what the Indians claimed in the first instance.

Afterwards they made a treaty with those Indians. In that treaty they acknowledged practically the right of the Indians to the land, but that treaty which provided that the Indians should be paid a certain amount, $1,500,000, for one-half of the reservation which was created by Executive order, was never accepted by Congress. On the contrary, Congress declared by its act at that time that the Indians had no title.

Thus the Indian being despoiled of his $1,500,000 was also deprived, by the action of Congress, of his right to the money itself. In other words, we threw open this territory, gave it to the public, but declined to pay for it. So when the Indian wanted his rights he was faced with a Congressional act which had denied after an investigation any title that he might have. Any Senator can understand, when Congress has once put in the form of a law its decision upon the title to Indians, how difficult it is for the Indian to establish his right against that claim.

Then they came to the Department. The Department knew the law; the Department knew what Congress had done, and it agreed with the Indians to affirm such contract as those Indians should make with attorneys for the purpose of impressing Congress, we will say, with the absolute right of the Indian to that land notwithstanding the previous action of Congress.

Now, had they a right to enter into any such contract? Mr. President, there can be no possible question upon that score. The provision of the law which was read Saturday, the statute of the United States, section 2103, provides that—

> No agreement shall be made by any person with any tribe of Indians, or individual Indians not citizens of the United States, for the payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value, in present or in prospective, or for the granting or procuring any privilege to him, or any other person in consideration of services for said Indians relative to their lands, or to any claims growing out of, or in reference to, annuities, installments, or other moneys, claims, demands, or thing, under laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts of any officers thereof, or in any way connected with or due from the United States, unless such contract or agreement be executed and approved as follows.

And then it provides for the execution and approval of it. By that very law we legalized any contract that is made with the Indians for any of those purposes.

Now, how is the Indian going to get his rights? The Government of the United States owes him. He can not sue the Government, can he? When you give him the right, therefore, to employ an attorney for the purpose of securing that right how is the attorney going to act? To whom will he appeal? To Congress. He can not go into the courts. He must get an act of Congress to go into the courts. He can not get an appropriation except from Congress. He must go to Congress to get that appropriation. Therefore, when that contract was made it was necessarily understood that it would be a contract to convince Congress that the Indian had a right which Congress ought to respect notwithstanding its previous action.

Now, what did the attorneys have to do in that case? The very first duty incumbent upon them as an attorney was to establish Indian titles. How are you going to establish an Indian title to land? As was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], by an abstract of title? That does not determine an Indian title to lands. He must find that those Indians have occupied that land practically from time immemorial.

I have had a little experience since I have been in Congress in attempting to determine the title of Indians to a certain tract of land—10,000,000 acres—in my own State. It was necessary for me to go through our oldest records. I had to get hold of every record that was made by the Hudson Bay Company, the great fur company, nearly 200 years old. I had to find out where they had established their posts; what Indians they dealt with there; who were the chiefs at that time; how many there were; what kind of Indians they were. I had to establish then the line of the chiefs from that time down as near as possible to make a clear case that the land had belonged to the Indians practically from time immemorial.

These attorneys had practically to do the same thing; and then they had to convince Congress not only that the Indian had the title, but they had to convince Congress of the righteousness of their claim against the Government for the $1,500,000, notwithstanding the fact that Congress had once repudiated it, and that was no slight job. No one could criticise the Department for authorizing them to employ an attorney.

Those attorneys worked on that contract from 1894 until 1904. They did make a clear case, not, as some Senators think on the other side, because the Department found that they had a title. The Department has nothing to do with establishing the title. Congress has to determine that question when it determines its legal or moral liability to the Indians. After less than ten years they had satisfied the Committee on Indian Affairs that they had a title to those lands and that Congress ought to pay for them.

What did the committee do? There were other treaties every year. Some of them had to go off. It was impossible to put them all upon the appropriation bills; and the only practical way to get an Indian treaty through Congress is by an appropriation bill. Year after year the Colville bill went off, notwithstanding the committee found it to be just, until the ten years had expired. So by our own negligence we destroyed the contract that would have given them nearly $150,000.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon an inquiry?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.
